of other countries in putting down the slave trade, and they might especially hope for the co-operation of the United States. Till recently America had been the great supporter of the slave trade. If disruption should unfortunately take place, he should look forward with great fear to the revival of the slave trade. Upon that point he might mention that Mr. Gancey, the leading Commissioner to Europe of the so-called Southern Confederacy, himself proposed a year or two ago in the Southern Convention at Montgomery a resolution for the repeal of the law of the United States against the slave trade, and for months supported the resolution with great energy and ability. He differed from his hon. Friend who introduced the subject as to the propriety of sending coolies into Cuba. He did not see how they could take on themselves the responsibility of their proper treatment under a foreign Government.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he thought that the only means of effectually putting the slave trade down would be by making it unprofitable, and that could only be done by rendering the production of free-grown sugar as cheap as slave-grown. He entirely agreed that the introduction of East Indian coolies into foreign countries was fraught with the greatest danger. At the same time he advocated the importation of free coolie labour into our own colonies. He was glad to find there was a great change of feeling in this respect, and that the measure was no longer opposed by those who were inimical to the slave trade. Under the present stringent regulations, however, it did not pay to invest private capital in that enterprise, as a sufficient term of service was not insured. As a remedy for that difficulty he would propose, although it might be an unpopular suggestion, that a differential duty should be put upon slave-grown sugar, which might be applied for the purpose of coolie emigration into our own colonies. He regretted that this country had so largely imported slave-grown sugar from Spain, and he thought the noble Lord at the head of the Government would inflict a heavier blow on Spain by putting a differential duty on that article of produce than by attacks on paper. If Spain gave up the traffic he believed it would cease in the quarter of the world alluded to.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that he thought the tone of the discussion proved, that there was not the least diminution in the deep feeling of hostility entertained in this country against the abominable traffic in slaves. He trusted that some of the observations made by the hon. Member for Galway would have their due effect upon Her Majesty's Government. It was an indisputable fact, that the capital and ships of the Northern States of America had been largely employed in this traffic, and our Commissary Judge at the Havannah (Mr. Crauford) said—

“Since the year 1858, when there was such outcry about our cruisers in these waters boarding American ships, the traffic has been almost exclusively carried on by vessels under that flag, which fit out and sail from the United States; and such has been the effect of the impunity enjoyed by the slave traders, that the American masters and crews no longer hesitate to continue on board, and have brought all their energies and cunning into operation to avoid their own Government cruisers, as well on the coast of Africa as in the waters of Cuba, from the last mentioned of which all Her Majesty's vessels of war have been withdrawn for the two last years.”

Our cruisers had been withdrawn from the Cuban waters because the American Government refused to co-operate with them in suppressing this nefarious traffic; and the American cruisers, being left to execute that task alone, had entirely failed in its performance. He earnestly entreated the noble Lord not to imagine that the restoration of the consul at Mozambique was not to be desired. The slave trade was carried on there to a considerable extent, and but for our cruisers it would be greatly increased. Dr. Livingstone was particularly anxious that there should be a consul at Mozambique. The trifling expense which such an officer would entail on the country would be amply repaid by the legitimate trade it would occasion, for there was a great demand there for our cloth and hardware. He looked with extreme jealousy on the plan for importing coolie labourers from India into the French colonies, and he hoped that the recent treaty on the subject would be laid on the table without delay.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I rise to make some observations upon what has passed with regard to the slave trade. I am bound to say that I think the House and the country are under obligations to my hon. Friend who brought forward this Motion, because this is a subject of the deepest interest; and it is impossible that this House can too often or too strongly express its opinions in condemnation of the continuance of this abominable traffic. The truth is that the abolition of the slave trade, although it may be, and, in some instances, has been brought about, as in the case of Brazil, by the exercise of force, cannot be wholly extinguished except by the progress of opinion, not only in the minds of different Governments, but in the minds of the different nations which they rule. I regret to say that of late years there has been a relapse on the part of our neighbours on the other side of the Channel. France very early abolished the slave trade. France not many years ago abolished slavery in her colonies; and we had reason to hope that, the French nation and the French Government being thoroughly convinced that slavery and the slave trade were abominations, and having determined to get rid of both, there was no danger whatever of their backsliding. But the first symptom of a relapse was seen when the French Government, under M. Guizot, refused to ratify the convention for the mutual right of search which was negotiated by the Earl of Aberdeen, its refusal being grounded on some Motion made in the French Assembly. That was, no doubt, an indication of a retrograde movement in opinion. Then came, four or five years ago, the Regis contract for the emigration of so-called free labourers into a French colony, but which was nothing more nor less than the slave trade in its purest and simplest form, at least as far as the acquisition of the labourers was concerned. It was the slave trade in the beginning of the process, though not entirely so in its end, because although these unhappy creatures were landed in a French colony, apprenticed against their will, subjected to regulations which rendered them liable to degrading punishments, and otherwise made to feel that they were in a state far from one of freedom, the French law did not acknowledge the system of slavery. The manner in which these negroes were caught was exactly the same as that in which the Spanish and the Portuguese got their slaves in order to send them to Cuba. It was said, indeed, that they were ransomed, and were to be set free, and documents were given to them which professed to be certificates of their emancipation. But they were obtained in the first instance by persons who sold them to the French by all those means of force, of violence, and fraud by which slaves were and still are procured for the Spanish market at Cuba. This, unfortunately, was the result of the ascendancy gained in French councils by the colonial interest.

That ascendancy was paramount; and for a long time the French Government was deaf to all the remonstrances made to them by the Government of England, pointing out that this was the slave trade, and contrary to every principle by which they had openly promulgated their resolution to abide. At last the French Government consented to put an end to that system, provided other means could be obtained by which the additional supply of labour required in the French colonies could be procured. The only means by which we could at all assist in procuring labour was by allowing the French to obtain coolies from our possessions in India; and the question was whether we would give them that permission on condition that the Regis contract should be put a stop to. I should say that two years ago the French Government, upon the urgent representations of the Queen's Government, did put down the exportation of the so-called free labourers at the Western Coast of Africa, but it still continued on the East Coast. There were great objections, such as those referred to in the course of this discussion, to our allowing these French colonists to go to our territories in India for the purpose of obtaining coolies. No doubt, it was liable to this objection—that improper means might be resorted to for, as it is called, kidnapping the coolies; and, therefore, it was necessary to establish regulations by which you should be sure that those labourers who went did so of their own goodwill, that they should not be overcrowded or otherwise ill-treated during the voyage, and that they should be well-used when they reached the island of Réunion or the French West Indies. These matters were the subject of long and difficult negotiations, because we had to contend with the peculiar interests of those who thought it better and cheaper to go on with the existing plan. The Emperor's advisers felt that the system was a bad one, and were anxious to co-operate with us to put an end to it. Accordingly, a treaty has been recently concluded by which, under certain regulations, the French colonists are entitled to bring coolies from India into the French colonies. It has been said that we give everything and get nothing. That is not exactly the case. It is quite true it permits the exportation from India to take place at once, while the French Government does not engage to stop the Regis contract until 1862—a period to which they are bound to allow that contract to continue in force. We might have said, "We will not allow you to get coolies while you are carrying out this contract." That point was considered, and it was decided, rightly as I believe, not to act upon that view. We felt that they would not get a less number of negroes if we refused them coolies; but that, on the contrary, it was probable if we allowed them to have coolies immediately they would find them better labourers, more subordinate, and cheaper than negroes; and in proportion as they obtained coolies so they would obtain fewer negroes; and, therefore, our object being to put an end to the abominations of the African trade, I think we were right in opening the supply of coolies at once to the French colonists. I am not sure whether that convention has been ratified, but when it is it will, of course, be laid on the Table of the House.

There is no doubt that the crime of slave trade does exist still, and to a great extent; but, omitting for the moment all question of the Regis contract, it is chiefly confined to the supply of Cuba. Now, how is that carried out, and how have we been prevented from putting an end to it? It arises from the corruption of all the authorities in Cuba, and the apathy of the Spanish Government at Madrid. We have remonstrated time after time; we have sent proofs that the slave trade is enormously carried on—that large fortunes are made by their officials—that Captains General go out poor and return rich. We were met by assurances that the orders sent out would be better observed, and that there was every disposition on the part of the Spanish Government to fulfil their treaty engagements. That is what we get from Madrid. It is unsatisfactory, but, of course, we are obliged to take the answer, especially when it admits the treaty obligations, and declares the intention of the Spanish Government to observe them. Then, in Cuba, when our consul sends proofs to the Captain General that a cargo of slaves has been landed at such a time and place, and calls upon him to punish the offenders, the Captain General says he will make inquiries, and after a certain time he reports that he has made inquiries, and is unable to trace any proof that a landing has been effected; and when he is requested to search certain plantations to which it is suspected the slaves have been removed, he replies that he has not the power to do so conferred upon him by the Home Government. So we have Cuba setting up Madrid, and Madrid setting up Cuba against us. That is a disgraceful thing for a country like Spain, and I believe that at last they feel it to be so, as they have lately sent additional ships to watch the coast of Cuba, in fulfilment of their treaty obligations. It is quite true that the importation of slaves into Cuba does not take place in Spanish ships, but in ships sailing under other flags, and especially under the American flag. There are some little Portuguese shipments from the East Coast of Africa, but it is mainly carried on under the American flag. Lately there has been some little amount of slave trade carried on under the French flag, but not to any great extent. We have, as is well known to the House, been constantly remonstrating with the American Government against that abuse—that prostitution of their flag. In one piece of correspondence I told them that a piece of bunting ought not to be a national passport. They took offence at that, and said I had insulted their flag. It was not the expression that nettled them, but the reproach that their flag was prostituted to base purposes. We tried to persuade them to grant a mutual right of search, but we were unsuccessful. We tried other plans, and at last we proposed to the Government of Mr. Buchanan that English and American cruisers should sail in company, and when any ship under the American flag should be taken with slaves on board, she should be prize to the American cruiser, and treated according to the American law; but when a ship was taken without a flag or papers with slaves on board she should be prize to the British cruiser, and be subject to our law. That proposal seemed too well calculated to accomplish its purpose to be accepted by the American Government, and accordingly it was declined. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) says that now that the North and the South are at variance is the time to get the assistance of the North against the South. It is quite true that at the time of the disruption of the Union—if we may assume it to have taken place—or before this civil contest broke out, it was the influence of the South which prevailed at Washington, and prevented the Government there from accepting any of the offers we made for the purpose of enlisting the support of the United States Government in the execution of their treaty engagements. There is a treaty engagement by which they are bound to co-operate with us for the suppression of the slave trade. For a time they sent one or two small vessels to the coast of Africa, and lately they have increased the number. But this I have observed, that when an American cruiser is commanded by a captain from the South, no effective assistance whatever is given us for the suppression of the slave trade. The Southern captain shuts his eyes to what is going on, and runs off to Madeira for supplies or water; but the cruisers commanded by captains from the North do give us very effective and vigilant co-operation. This would lead to the hope, no doubt, that if the turn of events should give to the North a more sovereign existence, possibly the spirit of the North would prevail over the influence which hitherto has controlled them, and, although most of the cruisers were fitted out at New York and at Boston, and, perhaps, with capital from the North, yet it was the spirit of the South which animated these expeditions. With a view to the suppression of this crime we have urged upon the Government of Portugal to exert its authority more effectually upon the eastern coast of Africa; but, as has been truly observed, the Portuguese possessions on the eastern coast are of enormous extent, thinly populated, and the ports are separated by immense distances, while the authorities there are far removed from the observation of the Government at Lisbon, with every opportunity for yielding to corruption and bribery; and, therefore, it is very difficult for the Lisbon Government to control what goes on there. I am informed by our Minister at that Court that that Government is doing all in its power by removing delinquents and sending out better persons as Governors to put an end to the evil. Whatever may be said of the Government of Spain, I have no doubt of the sincerity of that of Portugal in exerting all the means in its power to accomplish this purpose. I do not even despair of seeing the Portuguese Government adopt some measure for prospective emancipation. Portugal has no interest in the slave trade, but quite the reverse. Her possessions lie in Africa—they want all the labour for cultivation and improvement that the population will afford, and every man sent away is a man withdrawn from the development of the natural resources of the country. Spain is in a different position. Her colonies import labour from other places, and in their narrow and erroneous view every slave imported is as much gain. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hope) wants us to revert to a differential duty between slave-grown and free-grown sugar. The question has been frequently discussed, and Parliament has made up its mind that such a plan is not desirable, as evasion would be easy, and, if applied to sugar, the principle must be extended to slave-grown cotton, tobacco, and other articles. As to the particular point of establishing a consul at Mozambique, I am inclined to agree that it would have little reference to the slave trade. Mozambique is known to be an unhealthy station, and there would be a difficulty in inducing a consul to go and in insuring his continued residence when he was once there. I believe it was chiefly on account of the unwholesomeness of the place and the little influence he would have in checking the slave trade that the consul has been withdrawn from Mozambique, but at the same time the expediency of his return is a fair subject for consideration, and I can assure the House that my noble Friend (Lord John Russell), who is as eager and as anxious as any man can be to put an end to this abominable crime, will give to this and every other method of putting a stop to it the fullest consideration. I do not know whether there is any other point to which I ought to advert, but I can assure the House that both my noble Friend and myself and every Member of the Government are most anxious to complete the work—I will say the noble work—in which this country has been engaged for so many years. Cuba is now the only plague spot in the world, for I do not believe that there is any real importation of slaves into the Southern States of America. Cuba, I repeat, is the only real plague-spot, and I hope that by some means or other we may be able, if not entirely to put an end, at least greatly to check and ultimately to put an end to the abominable practice of the slave trade.

MR. LINDSAY said, he thought the abolition of slavery could be best effected by importing large quantities of free labour into the slave districts, as they would thereby reduce the value of negro labour, and, therefore, the value of the negro, and consequently render the importation of negroes an unprofitable occupation.

MERCHANT SHIPPING.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LINDSAY, in calling attention to the Report of the Merchant Shipping

Viscount Palmerston

Committee of 1859-60, said, that the House was aware that the shipping interest of this country for more than two centuries was a protected interest, and presumed to derive from protection peculiar advantages in which other classes of the community did not participate. Consequently, peculiar taxes of various kinds were laid upon that interest. In 1840 and 1850 protection, and all the supposed privileges of protection were taken away. The least the Government could have done when they removed protection was to remove those burdens and those restrictions which were created with that protection. Well, he was sorry to say that, though Committees of that House had reported over and over again in favour of removing the burdens which still fettered that great and important interest, most of those burdens still remained. For two years he had the honour of sitting on the Merchant Shipping Committee upstairs. That Committee, after great consideration, laid a Report, in 1860, upon the table of the House, recommending, under ten distinct heads, that various burdens and restrictions ought to be removed, and stating that these were questions which seriously affected the maritime interests of this country, with which it was the duty of the Government to deal. He had delayed calling attention to this subject up to that late period in the hope that the Government would have introduced Bills for the removal of at least some of the most oppressive of those burdens. From some cause or other he was sorry to say but one of those ten recommendations had been dealt with by the Government. The Merchant Shipping Committee recommended that the question of belligerent rights should be dealt with, and unanimously arrived at the conclusion that the time was come when all private property not contraband of war ought to be exempt from capture at sea. His hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) made four or five attempts during the Session to bring that question under the notice of the House. It was but reasonable that he and other hon. Members, and many out of doors who felt that we had a larger share of private property on the ocean than any other nation, should desire that that private property should be exempt from capture. But all attempts to bring that question forward were, he was sorry to say it, stifled by Her Majesty's Government. After unsuccessful attempts, on the 18th of February and the 17th of April, his hon. Friend on the 7th of May had an opportunity of bringing the question forward, but an appeal was made to him not to do so, on the ground that the whole question of the Treaty of Paris was under consideration. Now, he wished to know from his right hon. Friend, the President of the Board of Trade, what was the result of that consideration on the part of the Government? Again, a revision of the liability of shipowners who were exposed to heavy and ruinous penalties and conditions in fitting-out passenger ships, &c., was another of these recommendations which had not been carried out. So far back as 1845 a Committee, of which the noble Lord at the head of the Government was a Member, recommended that the shipping interest should be relieved from light dues, but since that period nothing had been done, and since then the shipping interest had paid for the liquidation of debts contracted for the purchase of private lighthouses no less than £1,250,000. Pilotage was a monopoly in the hands of private individuals. It was clearly shown that where pilotage was voluntary a better supply of pilots was to be obtained. With respect to local charges at various ports, the shipping interest was still taxed for crancage where there were no cranes, for buoyage and beaconage where there were no buoys or beacons, and for wharfage where there were no wharfs. It had been proved before a Commission appointed by this House that there were many who levied those dues who had no right to levy them, but even where there were rights those rights could be valued and redeemed, and he could not help expressing his surprise that the Government did not deal with them during the Session. It might reasonably be supposed that, considering the vast increase of trade, the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 and the Passenger Act might require some modifications, but nothing had been done with regard to it. In respect of the main and truly important question of reciprocity, he was sorry to find that nothing whatever had been done, and he feared that no exertions had been made by Her Majesty's Government to obtain from foreign nations those reciprocal privileges and advantages which we had long granted to them. France still maintained differential duties against us—duties so high as in many cases entirely to exclude our shipping. Spain, Portugal, the United States, and various other nations, including Austria and Russia, still excluded us from the coasting trade. There was one remark which struck him very forcibly which was made by a large shipowner who was examined before the Committee of which his right hon. Friend, the President of the Board of Trade, was at the head. Alluding to his ship in the port of Calcutta, he said—

In the Report of the Merchant Shipping Committee regret was expressed at the apparent apathy on the part of the Government in connection with this important question, and their neglect to enforce the retaliatory clause. That Report had been upon the Table of the House for a year and a half, and he wanted to know what had since been done to obtain from foreign nations a reciprocity of advantages. He was in America during the last recess, and Mr. Buchanan in discussing the question with him frankly admitted that it was no more right to call the trade between New York and California a coasting trade than the trade from this country to Calcutta. He believed, too, from what he learned while in France, that the French Government, if the matter were fully brought before them, would have seen the justice of reciprocating the many advantages which this country had granted to French ships. Of all the recommendations of the Merchant Shipping Committee only those relating to the abolition of passing tolls and the settlement of differential dues had been carried into effect. The right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, had given notice of a Merchant Shipping Bill, but it was too late for such a measure to be introduced in the present Session. He hoped, however, that the Government would early in the next Session bring in measures to carry into effect the more important provisions of the Merchant Shipping Committee. The shipping interest did not require protection, but they desired a clear stage and the opportunity of conducting their business without those disadvantages which they were at present subject to. Having made these observations, he did not intend to move the resolution which stood on the paper in his name.

MR. CAVE said, he was glad his hon. Friend had brought forward this subject. On most of the points he took he cordially agreed. He would remind him, however, that the difficulty of obtaining reciprocity was caused by our having given everything to other nations without stipulating for anything in return. He had intended asking the right hon. Gentleman a question on this subject, but was better pleased that the initiative should be taken on the opposite side of the House. Those who, like himself, were interested in the welfare of the Mercantile Marine had, he thought, reason to complain that the right hon. Gentleman had not, he might almost say, redeemed his pledge, but at any rate had not fulfilled his intention, and brought in again a measure which he carried last year, of great value and utility to the shipping interest—he meant the Clearance Inwards and Lien for Freight Bill—or, at any rate, incorporated its provisions in some more comprehensive measure. This Bill simplified and rendered intelligible the laws respecting freight, which were now the source of constant litigation. It also placed the law which regulates the landing of goods (which was now habitually disregarded) on a footing more in accordance with the important changes caused by the general use of steam in merchant shipping. The right hon. Gentleman met with no opposition from that side of the House. He was sure he would allow that he gave him, in his humble way, all the assistance in his power both in and out of Parliament, as did the Member for Sunderland. The Bill was one which severely tried the patience of those interested in it. It appeared on the orders of the day two or three times a week during the greater part of the Session, and eventually came on between two and three in the morning, in an empty House, when the reporters were worn out, and the space in the papers allotted to reports filled up, when it might be said that virtue was its own reward; for though for two or three nights there were lengthened and animated discussions, strong opposition from a few hon. Members opposite, whose constituents were interested in maintaining the present anomalous state of things, and two or three divisions, yet all these exertions, all this expenditure of time and patience were as little known to the public as the achievements of the heroes who lived before Agamemnon. However, the Bill passed, and if they might judge by the comments of the Shipping and Mercantile Gazette, and other papers specially devoted to the subject, it gave universal satisfaction to the shipping interests. It was too late, unfortunately, to pass through the House of Lords, and it was generally supposed that it would have been re-introduced at the earliest moment this Session. A Bill of this sort, full of details affecting particular interests, and which Members in general could not, or at any rate would not give themselves the trouble to understand, had little chance unless it was brought in as a Government measure, and he did hope that the right hon. Gentleman would give the assurance that evening that he would introduce some measure of the kind as early as possible next Session.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the real reason why he had not dealt with some of the subjects to which the hon. Member for Sunderland had called the attention of the House was that the opportunity of doing so had not been afforded him. He had brought in a Bill for the purpose of abolishing passing tolls, but when that measure received the assent of the House he found there really was no time at his disposal to proceed with a measure of such magnitude as that to which the hon. Member for Sunderland adverted. So far as light dues were concerned, the question arose whether the object for which they were imposed should be carried out by means of public taxes or of dues levied on shipping, and, although a good deal might be said in favour of the former alternative, yet he could not help thinking there was nothing very unreasonable in the latter when it was taken into account that it was chiefly for the benefit of the merchant shipping that the lights were maintained. If, he might add, the charges under that head had not been placed on the Consolidated Fund they had, at all events, been reduced to the extent of £60,000 or £70,000. Then came the question of compulsory pilotage, which was beset with much difficulty. In principle there was, he admitted, not a little to be said in favour of not compelling the owners of vessels to employ pilots, while there was a legal difficulty pointing in the same direction, inasmuch as if, as matters at present stood, a ship in charge of a compulsory pilot did, owing to his fault, any damage, the owner was not held to be liable to make compensation. Indeed, the consequence of that state of the law was to give shipowners themselves an interest in upholding the system of compulsory pilotage, and he was not at all sure, therefore, that if a measure for its abolition were introduced it would not meet with some opposition from that quarter. Be that, however, as it might, the subject was one with which the Government fully intended to deal, and a Bill had actually been prepared, which he thought would be found to contain some satisfactory provisions with reference both to light dues and pilotage, and which he hoped to be able to lay on the table of the House at an early period next Session. He now came to the complaint of the hon. Member for Sunderland that the Government had taken no steps to insure reciprocity from foreign countries, and he begged to assure him that in that respect he was in error, as he would discover if he were to look into the records either of the Foreign Office, or of the Board of Trade, which clearly showed that Government had lost no fitting opportunity of representing to foreign countries the claims which England possessed to full reciprocity in navigation. The subject was one, he might add, on which a great deal of misapprehension prevailed in this country as to the extent to which reciprocity was really withheld from this country by foreign nations. At present there were only three countries—France, Spain, and Portugal—that in the indirect foreign trade did not give to England complete reciprocity. In the direct foreign trade they had, he believed, reciprocity with every country. He believed that British ships coming direct from England received national treatment in almost every country in the world. In many countries the coasting trade was given to England in consequence of the repeal of the navigation laws. And it was something to say that the three countries he had mentioned were the only countries that had not given to England complete reciprocity. With regard to the direct trade with France they were on the footing of national ships. With regard to the indirect trade with France they had recently received very considerable relaxations. The differential dues on jute and cotton wool coming from Australia and India to France had been abolished, and those articles were liable to the same duty, whether brought in French or English ships. That was a great object effected, and he hoped we might be able to secure a still larger share of advantage in that direction. He quite concurred with the hon. Member for

Sunderland in regarding the shipping interest as of the utmost importance, as well as with respect to the expediency of adopting the necessary measures for its encouragement; but he should beg the House to bear in mind that that interest was evidently increasing both in amount and prosperity. He found, for instance, that for the first six months of the present year, ending the 30th of June, the total British tonnage entered and cleared with cargo amounted to 5,951,722 tons as against 5,628,589 tons in the corresponding period of 1860; and 5,429,277 for the first six months of 1859, thus showing a regular increase of tonnage for those three years. He also held in his hand a statement which proved that the repeal of the navigation laws had, instead of doing harm, done great good to British shipping, though we had not received from any country the same privileges of free navigation which they granted to all the world. Be that, however, as it might, he found that on comparing the year 1860 with 1850, the year immediately subsequent to the repeal of the navigation laws the tonnage entered and cleared with cargoes in the former year amounted in six months to three-fourths of what it was for the whole year in 1850. So that since the repeal of the navigation laws there was a constant increase in the amount of tonnage. It might also be satisfactory to the House to know that our export trade was exhibiting no signs of that decline which some persons anticipated, inasmuch as for the month ending the 30th of June last the declared value of British exports was £10,362,893 as against £9,236,454 for the month of June, 1860. The decline in the export trade was not so considerable as many people supposed. In the first six months of the present year the declared value of British exports was £60,143,425; in the first six months of 1860 it was £62,019,989, showing a decline of only 3 3-10ths per cent—a much smaller decline than at the commencement of the year seemed probable. He might mention that there had been a considerable increase in their trade with Italy and also with China, owing, no doubt, in the case of Italy to the changes that had taken place, and to having the benefit of a more liberal system under the Sardinian Government. He mentioned these facts in order to remove an impression which seemed to prevail—that some very considerable decline was taking place in the export trade of this country, which might have a serious effect on the revenue of the country and on the interests of the merchant shipping. The hon. Member for Sunderland was not more anxious than were the present Government on every fitting occasion to urge upon foreign countries the claims of the country in regard to freedom of navigation. At the commencement of the next Session a Bill would be introduced dealing with light dues, compulsory pilotage, and the liabilities of shipowners, and he trusted it might become law.

In reply to a question from Mr. CAVE, Mr. GIBSON said, he could not give a definite pledge to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Cave) that the Bill which he (Mr. Gibson) introduced last Session, and which passed that House with reference to clearances and freights inwards, would be re-introduced next Session. Since that Bill passed the House of Commons representations had been made which somewhat altered the view originally taken by the Customs authorities in this matter. He could only promise that a measure dealing with the subject would be introduced.

THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH AND ITALY.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose to call attention to the tone and tenour of certain telegraphic despatches which had just been addressed to the Italian Government by the Emperor of the French. A few days before at Vichy the Emperor Napoleon happened to cast his eye over a Legitimist journal, called the Gazette de France, where, in the correspondence from Naples, he read a statement to the effect that General Pinelli had ordered three peasants to be shot for the alleged offence of having carried provisions to the brigands. Without further inquiry the Emperor sent off the following despatch to General Fleury, who was then in the north of Italy:—

“The Emperor to General Fleury.

“Vichy, July 21, 10.35.

“I have written to Rome to make remonstrances. The accounts which arrive are of a nature to alienate from the Italian cause all honest hearts. Not only misery and anarchy are at their height, but the most unworthy culpabilities are the order of the day. A general, whose name I have forgotten, having forbidden that the peasants should carry provisions with them in going to their work in the fields, has caused those to be shot upon whom a morsel of bread had been found. The Bourbons have never done anything like that.”

That despatch was shown to Baron Ricasoli on the evening of the 23rd, but on the morning of the same day the journal L'Italie had given the following account of the matter:—

“The Gazette of France, in its correspondence from Naples of the 9th of July, announces that General Pinelli had caused three peasants to be shot who were suspected of having conveyed provisions to the brigands. We are able to contradict absolutely this story on every point. What may have afforded a pretence for it are the dispositions made by General Pinelli to forbid the bakers in localities exposed to the attacks of the brigands, from making a larger quantity of bread than required by the population of the place, and from selling it to persons outside; which is a measure of simple prudence, to prevent the maintenance and extension of brigandage. We, therefore, totally deny the fact related by the Gazette de France, and assert its statements to be falsehoods, and totally undeserving of credit.

In order, he supposed, to make the despatch more insulting to the Italian Government, it was not sent in cipher, but in the ordinary language of the country, and its contents were known by every clerk between Vichy and Turin. If brigandage existed in the South of Italy nobody was more responsible for it than the very man who now affected a virtuous indignation and presumed to insult the Italian Government on account of an erroneous statement in a Legitimist newspaper. He believed that that proceeding on the part of the Emperor of the French would have a very different effect from that which it was intended to have on the Italian Minister. Baron Ricasoli was distinguished for firmness of mind and nobility of character. Not a single inch of Italian territory would ever be yielded by him, and his answer to the gratuitous rebuke from the Emperor of the French would be such as to vindicate the independence of Italy.

MR. HENNESSY said, he believed it might be alleged on behalf of the Emperor of the French that he knew what was going on in the South of Italy, and that in addressing the despatch to which the hon. Member had alluded he thought he was only discharging a duty to humanity by protesting against the shooting down of peasants who were fighting for their legitimate Sovereign.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: Sir, I entirely

approve the course which has been taken by the Admiralty as explained by the noble Lord at the morning sitting. The protection of our own shores, our enormous commerce, and our wide-spread colonies and dependencies renders it a matter of vital importance that our navy should be placed on a footing not only equal, but superior to every other navy in the world. Our naval supremacy was essential to our existence as an empire. I, therefore, not only concur in the present Vote, but in the next Session will give my cordial support to any increase of the Estimates of £2,300,000 now assumed, which might be thought necessary. I wish to know from the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty whether the six ships he names to be the intention of the Admiralty to build were to be altogether of iron, or of wood and iron combined. At no distant period, I believe, the staple material to be used generally in the construction of our ships would be iron, but there could be no objection to converting those for which the timber had been prepared into iron-cased ships; and, independently of large ships like the Warrior and Black Prince class, we required some of the smaller dimensions, not more than 280 feet in length, carrying, say, eighteen guns, and cased entirely in iron, and having a speed of not less than twelve knots an hour. I consider it a great error in having built the Warrior and Black Prince with tender ends, and both bows and quarters unprotected; likewise I beg to call attention to the urgent necessity in our being provided with a number of formidable gun and mortar-boats. I did not exactly understand what the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty proposed with respect to the construction of the six ships about to be laid down—what was to be their tonnage, what description of guns were they to carry, and were they to be built entirely of iron, or of iron and wood combined—were they to be built by contract, or to some extent in our naval yards? Before the Admiralty proceeded with these ships the Warrior and Black Prince should be thoroughly and fairly tested in respect to their general good qualities, not being sent to sea in smooth weather, sea, and wind, but with the prospect of a heavy sea and strong gale of wind.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he had heard the statement of the noble Lord that morning with great satisfaction, and it had also afforded him no little gratification to find the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich giving the noble Lord his earnest support. He had, however, heard with great surprise the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), although in a tolerably full House, propose that the Vote should be postponed in order that it might be discussed when there was a larger attendance. They ought to support the Government energetically to enable it at the earliest possible period to have as good and efficient a fleet of iron ships as the French possessed. No man had studied the science of artillery more deeply than the Emperor of the French, and as soon as he had convinced himself that wooden ships could not resist the improved artillery of the present day he ordered iron vessels to be built. We had been slow in following his example, but once having begun to do so, our great resources and advantages would soon enable us to construct a fleet of equal strength to that of France. He thought the Admiralty had exercised a wise discretion in asking only for a small additional sum that year, as it would be some months yet before the experiments at Shoeburyness were brought to a conclusion. The Admiralty could not be too careful in the steps they were taking with respect to the mode of constructing iron ships. We had to reconstruct a navy which should have the mastery of any other navy in the world, and the average cost of each iron-cased ship was estimated at half a million sterling. There was, however, much to be ascertained respecting the powers of resistance of iron ships. It would be advisable if, when the Warrior was completed, she could be subjected to a number of experiments with heavy Armstrong guns. It was really no use in sticking up a single plate of iron 4½ inches thick to be experimented upon at Shoeburyness, for there were many other things which required to be tested besides the question of mere resistance, such as the best mode of putting the plates together, and the nature of the supports which were to be placed behind the armour plates. He was anxious to know whether the Admiralty had determined to condemn rolled iron plates, and to confine themselves entirely to the making of steam hammered plates instead.

Mr. LINDSAY said, that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, when this Estimate was brought forward at the morning sitting, thought the matter too important to be considered in so thin a House.

The question was now revived at the evening sitting, when the attendance was not any larger, and the right hon. Baronet himself was absent. He (Mr. Lindsay) wished to ask the question—whether, by that vast expenditure, they were creating a greater danger from within than that against which they were guarding themselves from without? Taxation was bearing heavily upon the people, and, if the harvest should prove deficient, and the unhappy war in America continue, vast masses of our people would be thrown out of employment. Then they would complain to Parliament, if they did nothing more, that they were ground down by unnecessary taxation. Against that danger they were more likely to have to contend than war with foreign Powers. Already the House had voted more than £12,000,000 that year for the navy, and now his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty coolly asked for £250,000 as an instalment of a sum of £2,500,000. In his (Mr. Lindsay's) opinion £4,000,000 was more likely to be the actual sum. As they were at peace with all the world he could not understand whom they were arming themselves against. It was said that they required six more iron ships, because a neighbouring power was increasing her navy; before his noble Friend asked for the Vote he ought to give the Committee ample information as to the present state of the French navy, and the number of ships she was building. The Government ought to state the whole truth and say if they were proceeding on any other information than the rumours of Admiral Elliot, who made a flying visit to the French dockyards, and represented that he saw vast preparations going on, but which the gentleman that he (Mr. Lindsay) sent there could not see. The Government had cased five wooden ships with iron, and now the House was asked for means to build six more iron ships equal in size and power to that terrible instrument of destruction—the Warrior. What would be the effect of this? Why, the effect would be that France would go on building her ten iron ships, which he did not believe she intended to complete for two or three years under present circumstances. It was useless to say to the House and the country, as his noble Friend did, "Don't be alarmed," because the people would not believe that there was not something behind if these ships were really required. If they went on in that way the French Emperor could not stop, however anxious he might be to do so, because the people and the Representative Assembly would bring an irresistible pressure to bear upon him to keep pace with England. Again, if the statements they had heard with respect to the preparations in France were true, there were even more ships than those proposed to be built were necessary, because England ought to occupy the first position in Europe upon the sea. But he did not believe those statements. As at present informed he believed we were fooling away millions of money, as he was convinced that the Emperor of the French knew it to be his interest to keep on terms of peace with England. Unless the noble Lord gave to the House a satisfactory statement he would resist the Vote, though he might do so alone.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is supposed by my hon. Friend that our information rests upon the statement of Admiral Elliot. Now, I do not in the least degree mean to discredit that Report, but we have other information upon the subject from totally different quarters. We know that the French Government have now afloat six iron vessels of various sizes—two of them two-deckers, not frigates—all large vessels. We know that they have laid down lately the keels, and made preparations to complete ten other iron-vessels of considerable dimensions. The decision as to those vessels was taken as far back as December last, but was not carried into effect until May, because they were waiting to ascertain what were the qualities and the character of La Gloire and other ships afloat. My hon. Friend says he sent a friend to the French dockyards who saw nothing. I remember an amusing story called Eyes and No Eyes—one person who saw everything, and the other, who made the same tour, saw nothing; but the one who saw was right, for the things he saw were there, and the things which the other man did not see were not the less in existence. Well, here are six ships afloat, or which can be completed in the course of next year. Ten others are begun, which will be completed, with ordinary exertion, in the course of eighteen months or two years, and which by great exertion might be completed in less time. We know that the French Government have great dockyard establishments. I cannot say off-hand what the area of their dockyards is, but I believe it is three or four times that of our own. They have an almost unlimited amount of labour, for they are not now occupied in building purely wooden ships, and if it were their interest or their view to hasten in any great degree the completion of these iron vessels—there is no illusion about them, for we know their names and the ports at which they are being built—if it suited them to hasten materially the completion of these ships, they might, probably, finish them in eighteen months. That makes sixteen iron-ships; but besides them France has, I believe, eleven floating batteries, as they are called, but two or three of which are very powerful seagoing ships. That makes twenty-seven ships in all, which they might have fit for sea at the end of two years. My hon. Friend asks if this is to go on, England increasing her force and France increasing hers. But I say in this case France has taken the lead. It is not our preparations which induce France to make her preparations; but it is her great preparations which render it indispensable we should make corresponding preparations. The hon. Gentleman tells us to look at home, and spoke about a bad harvest, interrupted trade, the industry of the country impaired and thwarted. Those would be unpleasant and lamentable results, but are we, in anticipation of those evils, with our eyes open, to add an additional evil—that of having another country superior to us at sea? Is that a remedy for those evils? Upon the contrary, it would be a great aggravation of them, and would expose this country to a condition which my hon. Friend, as a good Englishman, would be most unwilling to see it exposed to. There is nothing in what he has said to justify the Vote which he announced his intention of giving; and I hope, after this explanation, he will not feel it necessary to continue his opposition to the Vote.

MR. LINDSAY said, he hoped that his noble Friend, the Secretary to the Admiralty, would tell the House in what ports and arsenals of France the six great iron-ships, the eleven powerful iron-cased batteries, and the ten ships laid down, were to be found. If what the noble Lord had stated was true—and he ought to be accurately informed—his statement was quite alarming, and he, for one, would not be satisfied with a Vote of £2,500,000, but would be prepared to vote double that sum. France had no right to have these ships.

If she had them, she could not be honest in her professions to England, and it behoved us to know what she meant by such armaments. He could not help thinking, however, that the Government had been misinformed.

MR. HENLEY said, he should have remained silent on that question but for the observations made by his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Jervis), who had blamed him for suggesting the postponement of the debate from the morning to that evening sitting. The discussion which had already taken place was, he thought, a sufficient warrant for the postponement. The statement just made by the noble Lord the Prime Minister was not unimportant. His hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Jervis) had said that when the Navy Estimates were proposed the House was forewarned with regard to these supplementary Votes. His hon. Friend must have had quicker ears and more insight into mystical sayings than he (Mr. Henley) could possibly profess to have if such were the case. He should have been much surprised if any one had discovered in the speech of the noble Lord when he proposed the Navy Estimates a ground for the notion that a supplementary Vote would be taken pledging the country to a future expenditure of £2,500,000. He was more confirmed in the opinion that nothing of the kind took place, because the noble Lord took credit to himself for having made a candid statement with respect to the purpose for which the £2,500,000 was required. Had the supplementary Vote been announced when the Navy Estimates were proposed, or under discussion, it would now have been quite unnecessary for the noble Lord to say a word on the subject, and it would have been passed as a matter of course. He thought his hon. and gallant Friend had made a somewhat singular recommendation to the Government, after having blamed him for postponing this discussion, in having urged them not to go on in haste and to do nothing blindfold. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had recommended them to try experiments on iron-cased ships—on the Warrior, for instance—and see if they could not batter to pieces almost the only iron-cased ship we had got. He (Mr. Henley) did not think it a very satisfactory course to build up a ship at a vast expense, and then batter her to pieces. It was not quite clear whether the idea of building iron-cased ships did not first come from us, although the French had worked it out more rapidly and continuously. We had waited to see whether modern artillery would batter these plates or not. It was now quite clear that, under all circumstances, we must go on. He did not think the country had any choice in that respect, but he disagreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Lindsay) in thinking that this was a matter to be regarded as one of hostility on the part either of France or England. The hon. Member had no right to say that it was any proof of hostility on the part of France to choose to have a navy. The French always had a navy. We destroyed it at the time of the Revolution, but France chose to have a navy again. Nor was it a proof of hostility if France thought that iron ships were better than wooden ones. We ought to look at this question irrespective of France, and to take care that we had a navy equal not only to that of France, but all other nations put together. Every small State was building iron-cased vessels for itself. Unless we progressed with the same rapidity they exhibited, we should soon be in the minority. It was a great misfortune, but he did not see how it was to be helped. If we waited until men cunning in artillery battered the Warrior to pieces, and ascertained the number of plates that would resist shot from Armstrong guns, we should fall so much behind that when the pinch of the game came we should not be able to fetch it up. He held it to be the duty of the nation not to look with too jealous an eye at what the Government might do in the matter. The Government must do the best they could. No man could tell whether a ship plated in this or in the other way would succeed, and he did not believe that accurate information on such points would ever be gained until we were at actual war, an event which he sincerely prayed God would avert. Until then, however, we should not know whether big or little ships were best, or whether we were not better, as we had ever been, in smaller ships than our neighbours. We must trust to the Government upon these matters, and if they did their best not to be behind hand, he did not believe they would find the country, and at all events they would not find him, too apt to find fault with them because they had not adopted the course which experience afterwards proved to be the best. Unfortunately we should have to pay the piper, but that could not be helped. No necessary thing could be got without paying for it, and we must continue to pay for it. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lindsay) had taken a very curious course in this matter, for he had expressed his disbelief of the truth of the Prime Minister's statement. [Mr. LINDSAY: I said nothing of the sort.] He had certainly so understood the hon. Gentleman, for he had said, "If it is true, take £5,000,000, but at the same time I do not believe it." The noble Lord had used the strongest possible expressions in saying that he knew his statement to be correct; and, speaking as the noble Lord did from his place as Prime Minister, if 100 persons had been sent by hon. Members just to look round them, open and shut their eyes when they liked, perhaps having no eyes to see with at all, he did not think that the reports of such people ought to be allowed by the country to weigh for one moment against the positive declaration of the Prime Minister from his seat in Parliament that he knew the facts he stated to be facts. He should cordially support the Vote.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he considered the observations of the right hon. Gentleman to be so completely to the purpose as to render unnecessary any further statement in favour of the present Vote. He was sure the country would agree in what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, and, therefore, on that point he should not say another word. With respect to the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) he regretted that a gentleman of his knowledge and experience in shipping and love of country (for he had stated that very day that he was willing to vote any sum that might be necessary to put the navy on a proper footing) should have expressed himself as he had done in the face of being told officially, as he had been over and over again, of the increase of foreign navies in regard to iron-cased ships. Every word which his noble Friend at the head of the Government had stated he could affirm to be fact, and he could also inform the House that the increase in other navies was going on in a ratio corresponding with that of France. Austria was building two iron-cased ships; the King of Italy was building two, and had two others ordered to be constructed; and Spain was building two. So that there were not less than eight iron-cased ships over and above what were possessed by France, and he believed that Prussia, and, in fact, every continental nation were moving in the same direction. The right hon. Member for Carlisle had that afternoon asked whether the sum named as exhibiting the probable ultimate cost of the proposed ships was to go on over and above the ordinary Estimates of the next year. It was impossible to state anything with certainty for the future, but he was quite sure that his noble Friend the Duke of Somerset was anxious, inasmuch as there was to be that great expenditure in building iron-cased ships by contract, that there should be certain corresponding reductions made in the dockyard expenditure. He trusted that, if matters remained peaceable, and no unforeseen and unfortunate event occurred, in future years there would be a still further decrease of expenditure in the dockyards. That year the Government had decreased that expenditure by something like £300,000. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) seemed to think that because the Government were going to build very large ships of iron, therefore, the Admiralty had changed their mind, and had given up the building of wooden ships. It would be very improper that such an idea should go forth. There was no intention whatever on the part of the Admiralty to give up wholly the building of wooden ships. As far as these very large sized ships were concerned he believed that wood has not strength for the purpose, but for corvettes, gunboats, and other small vessels, which must be maintained for the protection of British commerce all over the world, as yet iron vessels had been found no substitute whatever. Therefore, he trusted that it would not be supposed, because it was necessary to construct at once a certain number of very large iron-cased ships of iron, that in future there would be no further building or repairing of wooden ships in the dockyards. The hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Captain Jervis) seemed to think that the Warrior no sooner than completed ought to be battered to pieces. That was not the intention of the Admiralty. What they were preparing to do was to carry on experiments against a target precisely similar to the side of the Warrior, and that target was now being constructed, and would, no doubt, be the object of very interesting experiments. He trusted his hon. Friend would not persevere in his opposition to the Vote, for in so doing he would be acting against the wishes not only of the House of Commons but of the country at large.

MR. DISRAELI: If I were to judge from a speech made a few nights ago by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord John Russell), and from the observations that have fallen from the noble Lord the Prime Minister on the present occasion, I should suppose that the good understanding between England and France was in great peril. Sir, that is not my opinion. Notwithstanding the rumours that are in circulation I believe that good understanding will be maintained; and I still hold the opinion which I have always expressed in this House, that upon that good understanding the happiness of the world and the cause of progress and civilization mainly depend. But how is it that questions of this irritating nature are mixed up with matters of business detail, such as those which ought to occupy the attention of the Committee of Supply this evening? There is no doubt that a great change has taken place in ship-building. There is no doubt that there is no country in the world so interested in ascertaining the best construction of vessels, and of vessels of war especially, as our own country. But it does not follow that because we feel it to be our duty to reconstruct the navy of England upon the undoubted principles of science which now are acknowledged, we should be supposed to be taking a course adverse to the interests of any other country, and especially to a country so near to us, with which our interests are so various and numerous, and with respect to which, whatever may be the occasional misunderstandings there is no doubt that the general tendency of our policy for nearly the last half century has been that of increased amity and increased good understanding. Well, is there any cause for this irritating discussion? Is it France that objects to the reconstruction of the English navy? Is it France that objects to our building iron ships? No one for a moment has ever hinted that there has ever been any protest from the other side of the water against the course which we are adopting. Well, I have yet to learn that we have felt it our duty to protest against the course which France is following. No one has maintained for a moment that France has not the right to establish a navy, and a navy of great power. She is justified in taking such a course by her geographical position, by her possessions, and by the general course of her conduct in various parts of the globe. But, then, it is said by some hon. Gentlemen that there is no termination, apparently, to this race of competition between England and France as to the respective positions of their navy; and I will admit that if every time we build new ships of war France immediately proceeds to build an increased number on her side, and if the moment we hear she is laying down new keels we are to enter into an indefinite competition with France—I admit that such a state of things would be most hostile, and perhaps, fatal to the interests and fortunes of both countries. But what is the use of governments? What is the use of diplomacy? What is the use of cordial understandings, if such a state of affairs can take place? I speak, of course, now with great deference to the Government on this subject; and I hope with that reserve which is befitting one of my inferior position compared with that of Her Majesty's Ministers on this subject. But, certainly, I have always been under the impression, at least so long as I have had any intimate acquaintance with public affairs, that, on the part of the French Government, there has certainly been for many years past a perfect willingness to come to an understanding with the Government of this country, if not in an absolutely definite sense, yet, generally speaking, as to the relative proportions of the naval powers of the two countries. That understanding has been by France candidly expressed and voluntarily offered, for France has always been ready to acknowledge that there should be a superiority—I will not say a supremacy, but a superiority, and a great superiority, too, on the part of England, in natural consideration of the undoubted superiority in military power possessed by France. I am under that impression. I cannot doubt that there is to be found on the part of the Government of France a readiness to come to an understanding as to the definite proportion which should exist between the naval powers of the two countries. Well, if that be the fact, and I cannot believe that any one will deny the accuracy of that fact, then I say that we do see the end of this reconstruction of the naval power on the part of both countries—that there is no danger of that indefinite and fatal and ruinous competition which has been referred to, and that we ought to see before us the point at which this vast expenditure should cease.

Mr. Disraeli

Well, Sir, if these be just views—if I am not mistaken in the facts to which I have referred—it is in the power of the Minister of this country to tell us that, no doubt, under existing circumstances, it is the duty both of England and France to reconstruct their naval power; but that they do so with the understanding that it is not that they have entered into a reckless competition on this subject, but that they have arrived previously at some grave political conclusion upon it, and that it is understood between the two countries that when that reconstruction has taken place it shall be accepted on the part of France that the superiority of the maritime power of England, the naval force of England, shall not be a subject of jealousy to France, but that she is prepared to willingly accept that naval superiority as the natural and inevitable result of the circumstances of the British Empire; France at the same time expecting from us that we shall exhibit no unjust or unnatural jealousy of her equally necessary military superiority. If the noble Lord at the head of the Government would only come forward and tell us this, with all the authority which waits upon the expression of opinion and upon the statement of a Minister, and especially one so experienced and influential as himself, a better understanding on this subject I cannot help thinking would prevail. I think on the part of the French people there would not be that hostile jealousy and that irritable feeling which I am sorry to see when debates of this kind take place; and on the part of England there would not be that undignified panic and readiness for reckless expenditure, which I for one entirely deprecate. Am I right or wrong in maintaining the expediency of this course? The noble Lord can tell me that I am labouring under a delusion if such be the case, and that it is a mistake to suppose there exists between the statesmen of the two countries that generous and wise and politic understanding as to the relative proportion of the naval force of each to which I have adverted. If he makes such a statement then I may be induced to believe that the wildest suggestions which I have heard in this House upon this subject may have some authority. But if the noble Lord can assure us—and I am unable to bring myself to doubt that he can—that the understanding of which I speak exists and that France, while establishing—as she is in my opinion perfectly justified in doing—a navy equal to the exigencies of her position and all claims on her power and patronage that may arise, is willing at the same time to acknowledge that she views with no jealousy on our part the reconstruction of our naval power in conformity with recent scientific changes and discoveries, on a scale greatly superior to that which she has fixed upon as the term of her exertions—if, I repeat, the noble Lord can give us that assurance it will, I have no doubt, have the effect of putting an end to the vexatious controversies in which we have been in the habit of indulging of late, and throw light on the subject. If, however, the noble Lord can do this I can hardly think he is justified in rising as he does on every occasion when discussions of this kind take place, and seeking to impress on the public mind that it is in consequence of unexpected and almost unnatural efforts on the part of France that he feels obliged to call upon the country to make exertions by which those efforts might be overpowered. For my own part, I hold that both nations need not stand with respect to this question in a hostile, invidious, or competing position. They are both great Powers with vast demands on their maritime influence, are placed in consequence of the revolution which has of late years occurred in naval affairs in a situation in which both are called upon to make great efforts to establish an adequate naval force. Instead, therefore, of looking upon one another under those circumstances in a criticising and hostile spirit, the leading statesmen, at all events, of each ought to use every effort in their power to enlighten the public mind, and to point out that the exertions which are being made to create those naval armaments are the inevitable result of that march of science which neither men nor nations can resist, that both countries, so far as can be judged, are justified in the adoption of the course which they are pursuing, and that nothing has hitherto occurred in reference to this question which England on the one side, or France on the other, can fairly impugn. But, that being the case, the interference of statesmen may bring about this result, that there shall be on neither side excess or extravagance of action; that there shall be no unnecessary or wasteful expenditure, and that instead of the people in both countries being oppressed, owing to rival exertions, care should be taken that, mutual understanding should exist that the naval power of each should not exceed the amount which the interests of each demand. Well, I say, if these grounds were placed fairly before the House—if the noble Lord called upon us to make those exertions in consequence of that great revolution in naval affairs, and at the same time should assure us that there is not an insane race of competition for naval power between England and France, then the Governments of the two nations would have each before them definite objects, and which when obtained need not endanger the peace of Europe, but rather consolidate and secure it. We should end unfounded sources of panic, and these circumstances, no doubt very distasteful to the population of both countries who have to pay for the expenditure, would not be a source of misunderstanding, but, on the contrary, would be clearly apprehended, and would tend rather to peace than to those hostile sentiments so often referred to.

Mr. WHITE said, he had heard with pleasure the sentiments which the right hon. Gentleman had so admirably expressed, differing, as they did, materially from those which appeared to find favour on the Opposition benches in the earlier part of the Session. It was evident the right hon. Gentleman looked upon the responsibilities of office as not very remote, and that he now deemed it the more statesmanlike course to adopt to come round to views which it was some time ago the fashion to regard with abhorrence when uttered by hon. Members who sat below the gangway on the Ministerial side, while every expression of hostility to France was greeted by the followers of the right hon. Gentleman with cheers. But, passing from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he had to complain that categorical answers had not been returned by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty to the questions which had been put to him by the hon. Member for Sunderland. He should, however, again put those questions to the noble Lord, and if he declined to reply to them, it only remained for him, in conjunction with his hon. Friend, to take the sense of the House on the subject. If the required information were not furnished, the probability was he would find, on taking up the Moniteur in a few days, a flat contradiction given in its pages to the statement of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and he wished, therefore, to have some more detailed knowledge with respect to how matters really stood. The questions he had to ask the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty were—what were the names of the six iron vessels now afloat to which allusion had been made? Where were the ten new vessels being built or laid down, and the eleven floating iron-cased vessels to be found?

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, these were points of detail which should be left to the Government. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government had assured the Committee that such a force was in course of construction in the French ports, and upon a former occasion the Secretary to the Admiralty gave the names of the vessels and the places where they were to be found. He hoped the Government would proceed with all possible speed in getting up the strength of our navy.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I rise to give the information which has been asked for by the hon. Member for Sunderland with respect to the French iron-plated ships. The Magenta and the Solferino are two-deckers. The Magenta is launched, and the Solferino is either launched or will soon be so. The Gloire is afloat, the Normandie is afloat, the Couronne is afloat, the Invincible is afloat, the Saigon is afloat, the Palestro is afloat, the Tonnante is afloat, and the Dévastation is afloat. Here we have ten vessels, two of them line-of-battle ships, four of them with 36 or 40 guns each, and four belonging to that formidable class which the French call floating batteries. We have then the Provence, the Savoie, the Revanche, the Magnanime, the Gauloise, the Valeureuse, the Heroïne, the Surveillante, the Flandre, and the Guienne. These vessels—improved Gloires—were commenced in the early part of this year, and are all in course of construction. We have besides the Congreve, the Lave, the Koudroyante, the Paixhans, and the Peiho—all floating batteries. There are two other vessels, the names of which I do not know, and as to which I have not such correct information, but I believe they are being built as floating batteries. The Magenta is at Brest, the Solferino is at L'Orient, the Gloire is at Toulon, the Normandie is at Cherbourg, the Couronne is at L'Orient, the Invincible is at Toulon, the Provence is at Toulon, the Savoie is at Toulon, the Revanche is at Toulon, the Magnanime is at Brest, the Gauloise is at Brest, the Valeureuse is at Brest, the Heroïne is at L'Orient, the Surveillante is at L'Orient, the Flandre is at Cherbourg, and the Guienne is at Rochefort. Altogether, the French have 16 large iron-plated vessels and 11 floating batteries, either afloat or in course of construction. Is any further information wanted?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I stated this morning that I entirely approve the course which the Government have taken in proposing this estimate, and I should not have troubled the Committee again had it not been for an error into which the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich has fallen with respect to the cost of these iron-cased ships. The hon. and gallant Member stated that we might take these ships as costing half-a-million each. [Captain Jervis: With their armaments.] Even with their armaments the estimate of the hon. and gallant Member is exaggerated. The most expensive of these ships is the Warrior, and yet I think I am right when I state that the whole cost of the Warrior, excluding the armament, will not be much, if at all, more than £300,000. The sum is enormous, no doubt, but still, as the expense is so large, it is desirable that it should not be overrated. The hon. and gallant Member will recollect that of the eighteen ships which are promised—twelve in progress and six proposed to-day—nine are to be of the Warrior class, and the remaining nine will consist of the four which the Admiralty are now building of considerably smaller dimensions, and of the five small wooden ships which were promised some time ago. It will be seen, therefore, that of the whole eighteen ships one half will cost only three-fifths of the sum which the hon. and gallant Member has estimated, and the other half will cost very much less. And now I must say that I have heard the hon. Member for Sunderland to-night with great regret. This morning the hon. Member told us that whatever number of ships the French may have we ought to have more. I was sorry to hear him this evening, I will not say retracting that expression, but declaring that if he stood alone he would vote against the proposal of the Government. On what ground? Because he did not believe their statements. After what the hon. Member has now heard I think he must abandon everything like disbelief, which, indeed, he had no right to entertain before. The statements which he refused to credit rested upon unimpeachable authority; the evidence was conclusive, and the hon. Member might as well have said that he did not believe this was the House of Commons. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Bucks that the question before us is not one of a foolish rivalry between England and France. The right of France to have a large navy has never been disputed; but, on the other hand, we must take care to maintain the same right for England. We have the largest colonial empire and the most extended commerce in the world, and it is our first duty to provide ourselves with an adequate naval force. I thoroughly approve the proposal of the Government, in which I see nothing hostile to France, and I hope it will meet with the approbation of the Committee.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he had no doubt his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, after hearing the statement of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty, would at once accede to the propriety of this Vote. He did not believe there was any panic in this country, but he was quite convinced the temper of the people would not tolerate that we should be left behind any other country in our naval armament. The proposal of the Government, which had been somewhat tardy, would be found in unison with the public sentiment. It was absolutely called for; and he was not without a hope that the strength of our naval armament would enable us to make reductions in other departments.

MR. LINDSAY said, that after the statement which had been made by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, that there were in France six powerful iron-clad ships now afloat, and eleven floating batteries, while there were ten iron ships in the course of construction, he should no longer oppose the Vote. That statement, however, was entirely at variance with the information he had received from high authorities in France. But he could not do otherwise than accept the declaration of the noble Lord, and he could not, therefore, take upon himself the responsibility of dividing the Committee upon that point. If what the noble Lord stated was correct he was desirous that the Vote should pass unanimously. But it was a serious subject for consideration how long that rivalry between this country and France was to go on, and he thought they ought to consider well the suggestion that had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the Opposition. The Government should, at least, make an attempt to come to an understanding with France, for the purpose of preventing this rivalry of expenditure. He could confirm what the right hon. Gentleman had said. France would not be the last to move, and if some arrangement was not made, it would not be the fault of France, but their own fault.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY.—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £206,629 10s. 9d., be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Excess of the Army Expenditure, beyond the Grants for the year ended the 31st day of March, 1860.”

GENERAL PEEL said, he had no wish to renew the discussion which had taken place on the previous day, or to object to the passing of the Vote. He must say, however, that there was nothing in the explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Under Secretary for War to alter the opinions he had expressed. He entirely disclaimed any intention, which had been imputed to him, to make a personal attack on the late Secretary of State for War. He had doubted the accuracy of his figures from the first, and he should not have discharged his duty if he had not come forward and stated wherein he thought his calculations were mistaken.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that he had not stated that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had made any personal attack on Lord Herbert of Lea, and he (Mr. Baring) had only defended the statement which had been made last year by his noble Friend against the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. No words had fallen from his lips which could lead any one for a moment to imagine that he had supposed that the right hon. and gallant Member meant a personal attack on Lord Herbert.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he should move that the Vote be reduced to £183,595. That was a remarkable instance of their total loss of control over the public money in consequence of the alteration which took place in 1845 in the Appropriation Act. They had no control over the expenditure either of the army or navy. In fact, he found that a million had been expended without the authority of Parliament, which he thought was too serious a matter to be passed over without notice, as it showed that that House had lost its control over the expenditure. He wished to ask whether in the last two months of 1859-60 there was not an excess in each of 9,559 and 11,327 respectively above the number of men voted by Parliament? He further wished to know whether any portion of the Vote in excess arose out of that excess in the number of men, and if not, from what source was the pay of that extra number defrayed? There were also two payments in the army grants which he thought were utterly indefensible, and upon which, unless satisfactorily explained, he should take the opinion of the Committee. One was a sum of £14,212 on account of the survey of London, and the other £8,820 for the survey of towns. It was stated that those works had been executed by the Board of Ordnance, respectively at the request of the Commissioners and the Board of Health; but, if that were so, those bodies should pay the expense, which could not legitimately be regarded as an army expenditure.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that there was certainly an excess upon some of the Votes; but, of the million spoken of by the hon. Baronet, £600,000 was expended for services caused by the China War, and was, therefore, properly charged to the Vote of Credit for that war; £200,000 was met by the savings upon other Votes, and the remaining £200,000 was the Vote now asked for. The excess upon the Votes did not arise from any excess in the number of regular troops, but from an excess in the number of the embodied militia, the excess in the number of regular troops in the months to which the hon. Baronet had referred was covered by their numbers having in others months been below the estimate. With respect to the two items which the hon. Baronet complained should have been charged to army services, the reason was that the work was originally done by the Ordnance Survey, which though strictly a civil service, yet was included in the Army Estimates. The money due on account of that work was partly repaid by the Board of Health. Those two balances, however, were left over, and as it was found impossible to get the money, the Treasury decided that the sum should be borne by the army Votes.

GENERAL PEELE said, he thought the hon. Gentleman had not met the case that had been put. There was an excess of expenditure of £973,000 upon five Votes.

Sir Henry Willoughby

How was that excess met? The Vote of Credit was not moved until March 14, and, of course, the money had then been spent. There was no doubt when the Vote of Credit was taken it was applied to meet the excess as well as all the savings upon other Votes; but it appeared that the authority of the Treasury was only given on the 2nd of April this year. Before the 14th of March he had asked his hon. Friend three questions—first, whether any portion of the 500,000 was to be appropriated to meet the expenditure upon the ordinary estimate, and the reply was, "None." The second question was whether the Treasury had given authority to appropriate the surplus upon other Votes, and the answer was in the negative. The third question was whether there would be any further Vote in excess, and the answer was "None." Now, he found that all the Vote of Credit, all the savings upon other Votes, had been disposed of before the expiration of the financial year. He had stated in March last year that £500,000 would not cover the excess of army expenditure, but that a further half million would be required. It now appeared that he was so far wrong that, instead of £500,000, the excess was £973,000.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that from the Returns he had moved for it appeared that the number of men voted for in 1859-60 was 122,659, and the number that was borne and paid out of the British Exchequer on the 1st of March, 1860, exclusive of the embodied militia, was 132,233 men, so that more than 10,000 men were kept and paid beyond the number voted by Parliament, which was unconstitutional. With regard to his Motion, it came to this, was a debt, whether it belonged to the Army or not, to be paid out of the Army Estimates? They might as well apply the money to the embankment of the Thames.

MR. PEELE said, he thought the hon. Baronet did not understand the question. The particular sums were irrecoverable debts due to army funds, and the only question was whether these sums should remain outstanding debts, or whether they should be charged to army grants. In 1848 the Commissioners of Sewers applied to the War Department to make a survey of London, they undertaking to repay the expense. The survey was made, and £10,000 paid on account, but when application was made to the Commissioners for the balance they said they could not pay without legislative sanction. The matter stood over, and when application was made to the Metropolitan Board of Works, in 1858, they objected to pay, upon the ground, among others, that if the Commissioners of Sewers had waited the survey would have been made for them gratis, there having been a survey made of the whole of England. The charge of £8,000 was made for surveys instituted by the Ordnance Department at the request of the Boards of Health of various towns, on the understanding that the local boards would pay for them, which they afterwards declined to do.

GENERAL PEEL said, that the number of men voted by Parliament in 1859-60 was 122,650. At that time the number of men below the Estimates was 20,000, but they were represented by the embodied militia, and he deducted from the pay and allowances £125,000, which he took for the militia. The money taken exactly corresponded with the number of men. What he wanted to know was out of what fund the expenditure of £973,000 was absolutely paid. Was it by appropriating the surplus of other Votes?

MR. PEEL said, that the Treasury gave authority for the issue from the Exchequer of the aggregate amount of the Votes on the Army Estimates, and they had no power of telling from day to day whether the amount of any particular Vote was exceeded or not. When the sum for 1859-60 was exhausted, application was made for a Vote of Credit, and then the Treasury gave authority to draw from the Exchequer on the Vote of Credit.

GENERAL PEEL said, that the surplus of one financial year had clearly been devoted to meet the expenditure in excess of a previous year. He should like to know where the money was held during the interval.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to know by what authority the Board of Ordnance had instituted these surveys of towns and sewers?

COLONEL DICKSON said, he had never heard a more extraordinary statement than that of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peel), that the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) did not understand what he was talking about. It now appeared that the ignorance was altogether on the side of the right hon. Gentleman. Earlier in the Session he had expressed an opinion that the Military Estimates would be nearer £16,000,000 than £14,500,000, the amount when they were first brought in. The House had, however, been called upon to vote for military expenditure alone, during the present Session, a sum little short of £17,000,000. He believed that such an expenditure was totally uncalled for, and that it was not distributed in the manner most serviceable to the Army.

SIR WILLIAM VERNER, in rising, pursuant to notice to call attention to the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains for the army, said, that every one who got a commission in the army and navy was expected to be a gentleman. It was also universally admitted that all the persons appointed as chaplains had been educated at the College of Maynooth. He said that in many instances these chaplains originally came from a very low class of society, and were, therefore, unfitted to associate with and attend upon officers in the army. He pointed out other inconveniences connected with the appointments, and complained of the great increase in their number of late and the consequent augmentation of expense.

Motion made, and Question put,

The Committee divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 52: Majority 7.

(3.) £637,000, Disembodied Militia.

MR. W. WILLIAMS remarked upon the enormous standing army kept up, and pronounced it to be unnecessary, considering the great Volunteer force which had sprung up. He would begrudge no funds for making the navy equal to meet all comers; but the army was preposterously large. He objected to the Vote for the disembodied Militia, believing that body to be very inferior to the Volunteers.

LORD BURGHLEY said, he hoped that something would be done for the Militia surgeons, who were most inadequately remunerated for their services. He suggested that that they should either receive permanent pay on the Staff, or have a certain amount of lodging-money allowed to them.

COLONEL DUNNE remarked that Ireland must be very badly off, for, as it was not allowed Volunteers, it had to put up with, according to the hon. Member for Lambeth, a very defective militia force.

But his estimate of the latter force was very different from that of the hon. Member. The efficiency of the force, however, very much depended on the Inspectors. Hitherto officers of the Line only had received those appointments. He thought the Inspectors should hold commissions in the militia. With regard to the lodging-money of the Serjeant-Major (4*d*. per day) it was only the mere pay given to a private in the army. He considered it ought to be increased, for the Serjeant-Major had many responsibilities resting upon him. He objected to the item of £500 for rewards for discovery of deserters, considering money so spent ill-spent. He thought instructors in musketry ought to be supplied by the Government. The Adjutants were too much occupied to be able to perform this duty. With these alterations he thought the Militia would be made perfectly efficient.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he believed that if half the attention were paid to the Militia that was devoted to Volunteers the former would be as fine a force as the country could possibly have to fall back upon.

MAJOR WINDSOR PARKER said, that the Volunteers and the Militia were drawn from very different classes of the community, and there was a difference between their motives for enlistment, but the only rivalry between the two forces was in their desire to be of service to their country.

MR. T. G. BARING said, he fully concurred in the observations of the hon. and gallant Member (Major Parker). He considered an officer of the Line had full power to inspect. The question raised by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dunne) as to lodging-money and desertion would be taken into consideration. Arrangements were being made for supplying instructors in musketry to the Militia, and due consideration would be given to the other suggestions made by the hon. and gallant Member who had addressed the House.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £30,000, further charges for Volunteer corps.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he thought it was a miserable sum, and that, unless the Government acted more liberally towards the Volunteers, the movement would ultimately fail.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution reported.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to know whether the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. B. Osborne) had correctly stated last night that the fresco of King Lear had been seriously injured by decay.

MR. COWPER said, that any one who would take the trouble to use his eyesight would see that the fresco had sustained no injury, and that the figure of Cordelia was in as perfect a state as when the late Sir Robert Peel had referred to Mr. Herbert's noble work as fully justifying all the money expended upon the House in frescoes.

Resolution agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Order for Committee read.

APPROPRIATION BILL.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he wished to know, Whether the Appropriation Bill would be printed, and in the hands of hon. Members, before the second reading? He should be glad also to know why the usual Appropriation Clause, the most important of the Bill, had been omitted from the Bill in the second Session of 1857 and again in the second Session of 1859?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that so far as he was aware, the printing of the Appropriation Bill was conducted by the officers of the House, and the Treasury had not interfered with it. A regular account was kept by the clerks of the House of the Votes in Supply, which was checked by an account kept by the Treasury. Therefore, the accuracy of the Appropriation Bill depended on the accuracy of these accounts. Whether the Bill should be printed or not was more a matter for the consideration of the House than the Government. He could not say why the clause was omitted from the Act of 1857, as he was not then a Member of the Government.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Will the right hon. Gentleman say why it was omitted from the Act of the second Session of 1859, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer?

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make no difficulty about printing the Appropriation Bill, which ought to be in the hands of hon. Members.

THE NEW SECRETARY FOR IRELAND.
QUESTION.

MR. WHITE: I beg to ask a question of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government. A new writ has been moved for Tamworth, and I wish to ask, Whether the hon. Baronet has really been appointed Secretary for Ireland; and, if so, whether he is still a member of the Carlton Club?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir Robert Peel has accepted the office of Secretary for Ireland. In regard to the Carlton Club, I am not in the secrets of that body.

WAYS AND MEANS.—COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved,

“That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there be issued and applied, to the service of the year 1861, the sum of £424,207 7s., being the surplus of Ways and Means granted for the service of preceding years.”

2. Resolved,

“That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the sum of £32,605,936 11s. 5d., be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.”

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.WINDSOR SUSPENDED CANONRIES
BILL—CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he should move, after Clause 1, to insert the following clause:—

“The said Ecclesiastical Commissioners shall hereafter pay over to the said dean and canons, or permit them to retain, one half-part of the share of divisible revenues of one other of the said suspended canonries, and the said dean and canons shall pay and apply the same unto and equally between the said vicars choral, in augmentation of their present emoluments.”

The adoption of that clause would only do justice to the vicars-choral, who were in his opinion fully entitled to the provision which he desired to make for them.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, that all gentlemen who were desirous to secure the proper performance of the services of the Church of England, especially in our cathedrals, ought to support a proposal for giving a fair remuneration to the lay clerks, whose position had during a long series of years been continually becoming worse and worse, and whose emoluments were now entirely inadequate to the proper remuneration of their services. He should, therefore, vote for the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was sorry that it was not in his power to accede to this Amendment. He had already carried the proposal for dealing with the suspended canonries to the furthest limit to which it was expedient to go. The hon. Member for Bristol had spoken of the vicars-choral as though they were clergymen, but in fact they were nothing more than the singing men of the choir. It was quite competent for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to raise the stipends of the vicars-choral out of the Cathedral funds without legislative interference.

MR. G. W. HOPE observed that he should be happy to see further remuneration granted to these persons.

MR. VANSITTART observed that, even if the right hon. Gentleman agreed to the Amendment, the revenues of five and a-half canonries would remain to the Commissioners. He thought that the claim of the vicars-choral was a very just one.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the Clause be now read a second time.”

The House divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 44: Majority 17.

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed that the whole tenor of modern legislation had been to respect the local claims of parishes, and he, therefore, wished a clause to be introduced to the effect that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should have due regard to such claims before they appropriated tithes. The great tithes of Wraysbury, which were £392 a year, were proposed to be given to the Military Knights and the two livings of Windsor. The net revenue of the clergyman of the parish of Wraysbury was £86 a year without any house to live in. They ought first to satisfy the just claims of that parish, and then he should have no objection to improve the condition of the Military Knights of Windsor.

Clause (Local claims in respect of Tithes) brought up, and read 1^o.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that if neither the clause nor the Bill were passed the proceeds would go to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and would be appropriated to increase the small livings generally, but not necessarily the living of Wraysbury. The Chapter of Windsor was on a totally different footing. The other chapters were no precedent for it, nor was it a precedent for the other chapters. The proposed arrangement was fair and equitable, and he hoped the Committee would not assent to the anomalous clause proposed by the noble Lord.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, that Wraysbury would be left by the Bill precisely as it was before, and, in fact, Wraysbury had no claim.

MR. VANSITTART said, he hoped the noble Lord would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing.

Clause 2 (Appropriation of Profits of Eighth Canonry to Churches).

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that if they went on nibbling in this way at the source of revenue of the common fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, they would very soon have other claims as irresistible, and the common fund would disappear. It was a retrograde step in legislation which was gradually bearing fruit with the greatest possible advantage. He, therefore, felt it his duty to divide the Committee against the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he did not propose the clause as part of a general policy, and it would not become a precedent.

LORD JOHN MANNERS supported the clause on the ground that it recognized local claims.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM observed that whatever specialty might have been in the case of Windsor there was a waiver on the part of the Crown of its rights. If the clause received the sanction of Parliament it would reverse the principle on which the common fund was placed.

MR. WALTER said, he thought that it was a great oversight in the composition of the Ecclesiastical Commission that some stipulation was not laid down that parishes, the tithes of which were dealt with, should be considered in reference to their spiritual wants before the money was applied to other purposes. But that was not proposed to be done by the present Bill, and he could not support a clause which established in that case exceptional legislation, which was not applied to other cases.

MR. HENLEY observed that if the clause passed the common fund would be gone.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 13: Majority 26.

Sir George Lewis

Clause 3 (Mode of ascertaining Amount of Payments to be retained), ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, he would propose an Amendment in Clause 3, the effect of which would be to exclude commanders and masters in the navy from the privileges of naval knights. The intention of the bequest was that these persons should be exclusively lieutenants in the navy.

Amendment proposed, in Clause to follow Clause 3, line 5, to leave out from "knights" to "it," in line 7.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Amendment negatived.

Bill to be read 3^o To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions reported.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he should not put the Motion of which he had given notice relative to the National Gallery. He wished, however, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Works whether it was true that plans had been prepared by Mr. Pennethorne to throw out a wing for the reception of Turner's pictures bequeathed to the nation, and whether an estimate had not been prepared for the whole plan by Mr. Pennethorne? He should also be glad to know whether the matter was not in such a mature state as that an application had been made to the war authorities for permission to take a portion of the exercise ground of the barracks. If that were so he would ask that no steps should be taken during the recess without the sanction of Parliament. Such expenditure he considered as wholly unnecessary, because the time fixed under the will of Mr. Turner for placing the pictures in the National Gallery would not expire until the 16th of December, and Sir Charles Eastlake, the President of the Royal Academy, and director of the National Gallery, had stated that there was plenty of room in the present gallery where the pictures could be placed without incurring one shilling of expense to the public. There being, therefore, no necessity for any expenditure of this kind, he was anxious to obtain a pledge from the right hon. Gentleman, the First Commissioner of Works, that under no circumstances would any plan of the sort be carried out until the sanction of the House of Commons had been obtained for such a step.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he desired to impress upon the Government the propriety of not commencing any works of that description until the whole subject had been fairly discussed in the next Session. There could be no doubt that the whole of our national buildings were in a disgraceful state, owing to the want of harmony and unity, and it was of great importance, not only on account of the interests of art, but of economy, that opportunity should be afforded of considering some comprehensive system.

MR. COWPER said, he thought it rather hard that the hon. Gentleman should imply that there was any desire for incongruity of design in the public buildings on the part of the Government. The argument chiefly relied upon by the Government for building the new Foreign Office in the Palladian style was that that style would be most in harmony with the buildings in its vicinity, whereas the hon. Member was in favour of a Gothic design, which would be in contrast with them. He had to state in reply to the noble Lord that there was no plan of Mr. Pennethorne's for a National Gallery in such a state of maturity as that it could be produced. The question as to where the national pictures should be placed had been under consideration by the Government for two or three years, and had been before the public for fifteen years. The difficulty had arisen out of the possession of two good sites—Trafalgar Square and Burlington House. If they had only one site, the appropriation of a plan to it would be comparatively easy; there would be no difficulty in building a gallery over the back of the barrack-yard at a trifling expense, as it would not require much architectural ornament. ["Oh! oh!"] He meant that, not being seen from any thoroughfare, being seen only from the waterworks in Orange Street, it was not of consequence that the gallery should be of a very ornamental character. The cost would probably be about £25,000. He must say, however, that no plan had been prepared on which the Government had been able to come to any decision; but he trusted that plans would be ready before the House was asked to agree to any Estimate next year. The noble Lord wished him to give a pledge that during the recess under no possible contingency would any money be spent on a National Gallery that had not received the sanction of Parliament. At first, he thought the request rather absurd, because he was not contemplating any expenditure that had not received the sanction of Parliament, but, on reflection, he perceived the question of the noble Lord to be not so very unreasonable, as the Government of which the noble Lord was a Member actually did the very thing that he now wished not to be done. [Lord HENRY LENNOX: A burnt child dreads the fire.] Then the noble Lord, with a guilty conscience and stung with remorse, was haunted by the apprehension that he (Mr. Cowper) would follow the bad example of the Government of which he was a Member. He could hardly tell what the noble Lord was driving at—whether he wanted to throw blame on the Royal Academy—[Lord HENRY LENNOX: No!] —or whether he wished to protect the public mind from pollution from Turner's pictures; for the noble Lord informed the House the other day, to the great astonishment and indignation of the admirers of Turner's pictures, that that great artist was guilty of pruriency. No man had a higher love of pure nature, or could better represent its noblest aspects than Turner; and the study of his works was calculated to improve, refine, and elevate all who were capable of appreciating them. The noble Lord must, therefore, be under a misapprehension when he attributed evil to Turner's paintings. The question put to him was whether he, as First Commissioner of Works, was ready to pledge himself that he would never do what had been done by the Government of the Earl of Derby in 1858. When Parliament was asked to Vote £10,000 which had been spent by that Government in building a gallery, they considered that the Government had acted for the public benefit in the emergency that had arisen, and voted the money. It might possibly happen that during the recess the National Gallery might take fire, or that some valuable bequest of pictures might be made on condition that within a stipulated time, which would expire before the opening of Parliament, they should be placed within the National Gallery. In the case of the fire it would be a very foolish thing not to repair the building; and in the case of a bequest of pictures of great value, every hon. Member would wish that a small sum should be expended in erecting a gallery instead of waiting for the Vote of the House. To resolve that it was inexpedient to take any steps for committing the House to spend money without the sanction of Parliament was to affirm a truism, yet there might be cases in which it was the least of two evils. So far as he was concerned, nothing but necessity should induce him to take upon himself the serious responsibility of spending the public money without the leave of the House, and he knew of nothing likely to render so improper a course necessary. With regard to the Turner pictures, if upon legal investigation it was found that they must be placed within the building by a certain date, there was no such immediate necessity as the noble Lord supposed to erect a building for them, as they might either be hung in the place of existing pictures, or they might be put in the National Gallery without being exhibited.

MR. AYRTON said, he must apologize to the right hon. Gentleman for having exclaimed "Oh, oh!" but he confessed he never heard such a flow of observations upon so small a matter. There was no necessity for them, especially when they considered it was a Saturday meeting of the House. The only thing necessary was for the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Government had no intention to enlarge the National Gallery without the House first seeing the plans for the purpose. The right hon. Gentleman had opened up such a field of discussion, that if he (Mr. Ayrton) were to take it up there would be no end to the sitting.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that if a Member fell into error he owed it to himself and the House to correct it. He had received several letters complaining that he had asserted that some of Turner's pictures were of a prurient character. [An hon. MEMBER: You said "drawings."] He had also received a letter from the executor of Mr. Turner, explaining that there were two or three sketch-books of that distinguished artist which were not allowed to be exhibited. They were, however, finished drawings, and they did not, therefore, come within the terms of the will.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the exercise-ground of the barracks at the back of the National Gallery was quite small as it ought to be, and if any plans were taken for the enlargement of the National Gallery it would be necessary to remove the barracks to some more convenient situation.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he considered the answer of the right hon. Gentleman very satisfactory in reference to the National Gallery, but some departure from the principle laid down would be absolutely necessary in the case of the accommodation in the kitchens of the House of Commons.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SELWYN said, that in a recent debate there had been a general expression of opinion on the part of the House that a liberal grant ought to be made on behalf of the Volunteer force. The two points upon which it was agreed Government should be given were—in furnishing drill instructors, and in assisting Volunteers in the acquisition of rifle ranges. Colonel M'Murdo stated the other day that the present number of the Volunteers might be estimated at 170,000, and the Government grant for instructors might be taken at about 2s. 4d. a head. It must be remembered that in extending the drill instruction of the Volunteer corps the Government were retaining in the army a very valuable body of men, and at the same time rewarding them for long and distinguished service. In regard to rifle ranges, the Volunteers had never asked the Government to supply them, but only wished to be allowed to acquire them for themselves without unnecessary expense. He had taken up the matter quite at the end of a Session, and the Bill he had proposed had not, therefore, passed in its integrity. The Volunteers now asked that the Act of Parliament should really be carried into effect by all the public departments, and that, if necessary, it should be amended. An excellent rifle corps at Kingston-upon-Thames, being unable to obtain a rifle range, made application for a rifle range in a retired part of Hampton Court Park, which they offered to prepare and make perfectly safe at their own expense. Their application was refused, on the ground that the firing would frighten the colts in the park. Whether these colts, being thoroughbred, were more likely to be frightened than others he could not say. [Sir JOHN SHELLEY: They would be less so!] But other horses became so accustomed to the firing that they soon ceased to notice it, and could scarcely be prevented from straying into the line of fire. The Surrey Militia when called out had not been able to fire a shot for want of range until they had been offered the rifle range of the Inns of Court Volunteers. He trusted that the new Secretary at War would see that the Volunteer corps were not hindered by any of the public departments in obtaining ranges which were absolutely indispensable to their efficiency. He trusted that next Session the niggardly Vote for drill instructors would be increased.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the greatest difficulty the metropolitan Volunteer corps suffered under was the want of rifle ranges, for the ground in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis was so expensive that none but the richer corps had any chance of acquiring a rifle range, even upon lease. He trusted that the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Lewis) would turn his attention to this subject, and see whether he could assist the Volunteer corps in obtaining ranges under proper regulations.

MR. T. G. BARING explained that there would be an expenditure on the Volunteers this year of £160,000, and as the Vote of £30,000 was for only a portion of the year the total Vote for Volunteers in the next year would exceed £200,000. That such afforded no evidence of a niggardly spirit on the part of the Government. With respect to the details of the payment of the drill instructors, that was a matter which might be safely left in the hands of Earl De Grey and Ripon, who would succeed him in the office of Under Secretary for War, the noble Lord having devoted a great deal of time and attention to the interests of the Volunteers. He had not heard of any complaints with respect to the carrying out of the Act for rifle ranges referred to by the hon. and learned Member, and he did not see in what respect the Government were to blame. He thought the corps to which the hon. and learned Gentleman belonged (the Inns of Court Volunteers) had not shown that cleverness or astuteness which they individually displayed, because, if they had provided themselves with a range, they would have obtained a grant from the Government.

MR. SELWYN said, the corps objected to receive the public money. They merely desired to obtain a range without being put to a large and unnecessary expense by the authorities at the War Office.

Resolutions agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.—REPORT.

MR. MASSEY brought up the Report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Resolutions reported.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that after the number of Supplementary Estimates which had been presented and voted, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he felt satisfied that the Ways and Means provided for the year would be sufficient to meet all the expenditure of the year. The right hon. Gentleman, in March last, had assumed that he would have a surplus of above £400,000, estimating the expenditure at a certain amount; but the expenditure had since considerably exceeded the Estimate, and he wished, therefore, to know whether sufficient Ways and Means were provided to meet the increase, and particularly the Vote for iron ships?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he felt obliged to the hon. Baronet for giving him the opportunity of stating a few details in reference to the subject brought under the notice of the House, and at the same time he must say that he entirely concurred in an opinion which had been expressed, that nothing was more inconvenient on all general grounds than the introduction of Supplementary Estimates. Supplementary Estimates ought never to be introduced, except for strong and special reasons, and he trusted the House of Commons would always require strong and special reasons to be stated why the charges included in Supplementary Estimates were not presented at the regular period, when the other Estimates were laid upon the table. The Votes now alluded to by the hon. Baronet might be accounted for on special grounds. The principal Vote relating to iron ships was one connected with a great exceptional operation, which he would not call the reconstruction of the Navy, but a great transition in the mode of building ships of war; and the other Votes partook of the same special character. The effect of the changes made in the Votes was that the Estimate for the Army, including the Vote for the Volunteers, had, upon the whole, been increased by a sum of about £17,000. The Vote for the Navy had been increased by a sum of about £247,000, which very nearly corresponded with the amount voted for the iron ships. A Vote of £30,000 taken for the dowry of a Member of the Royal Family belonged to the head of Civil Services, and required no explanation. The charge for the Civil Services had been increased by about £133,000, the reason of that being that, while a Vote of £155,000 was asked for in order to pay the amount agreed on in respect to the Stade Dues, there had been some small set-off on the other side, which reduced the increase to £133,000. The presentation of a Supplementary Vote on account of the Stade Dues, which, in conjunction with the Vote for the iron ships, might be said to constitute substantially the whole of the changes which had been effected in the Estimates, required no apology from him. That charge being dependent entirely on the conclusion of diplomatic arrangements in concurrence with other countries, it was impossible, and if possible, it would have been unconstitutional to ask the House of Commons to make, either in form or substance, provision for its payment until the instrument was concluded which made the desired concurrence a matter of certainty. Therefore, it was impossible to present that charge to the House with the ordinary Estimates of the year; but, when once the instrument was concluded, it would have been highly expedient to postpone the completion of the arrangement until another year, and thereby cause the trade of the country to continue to be subject to the inconvenience of the Stade Dues, while the trade of other countries would be liberated from it. Therefore, as to the amount of £400,000, without going into minor items, there were very special grounds to justify on the present occasion a practice which he nevertheless asserted to be highly inconvenient. In the Packet Service Estimates there was a change consequent on the termination of the Galway contract, and after making allowance for some trifling changes in the revenue department, the general result was that, whereas the Budget Estimate exhibited a surplus for the year of about £408,000, and the present excess in the Votes over the estimated expenditure amounted to £361,000, that surplus had very nearly disappeared, there remaining only the almost nominal amount of about £47,000. He was asked the question, whether he now felt reasonable confidence in the Ways and Means for the year, and he had to say in reply that in the absence of any extraordinary circumstances such as could not be foreseen or counted on, he felt the utmost confidence in their sufficiency. The opening of one very important measure of last year, which appeared more or less in doubt when he made the financial statement, had since the commencement of the financial year been satisfactory—he meant the measure imposing an additional duty on spirits. The revenue was, upon the whole, in a satisfactory state, and more than equalled the expectations he had expressed about three months ago.

MR. WHITE wished to know, whether it was true that the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) had accepted office as Under Secretary of State. If it was true, it was not, in his opinion, so bad a questionable an appointment as that mentioned in reference to the Chief Secretaryship in Ireland, an appointment which he hesitated not to say had carried the utmost dissent into the ranks to which he belonged in the House, as being evidence of a reactionary policy on the part of the Government. He had asked the other night whether the hon. Baronet was a member of the Carlton Club, and since he came into the House to-day he had received an assurance that the hon. Baronet was a member of that club, and that he was at the moment he was asking the question dining at the club. ["Oh, oh!"] The hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Hope) said "Oh, oh!" These appointments might be satisfactory to him, but they were not so to Members below the gangway on the Ministerial side of the House, and he could only say if that appointment had been made a month ago the Government would at this moment have been on the other side of the House. If the appointment of the hon. Member for Southwark was a fact he thought some apology was due to him (Mr. White) from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, for when he (Mr. White), having watched the career of the hon. Member for Southwark, knowing his Ministerial proclivities, ventured to dissent from accepting that hon. Gentleman as a representative of hon. Members below the gangway, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets assailed him in his own vigorous style, and brought down the cheers of hon. Members.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member could not refer to past debates.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. WHITE said, he merely wished to express his dissatisfaction and that of hon. Members below the gangway at the recent appointments, as an evidence of a reactionary policy on the part of the Government which would lead to their ruin. He would recommend them to put their House in order, for if those changes had taken place a month earlier they would now be occupying that (the Opposition) side of the House—not their present places.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he would put it to his hon. Friend whether it was a right course to attack an absent man. He should be sorry to have it supposed that the Liberal Members below the gangway deemed it their duty to dictate to the Government in reference to the appointment of individuals to public office. The responsibility for the appointments rested with the Ministry; and with regard to the hon. Member for Tamworth, no one could deny that the hon. Baronet had shown great talent. He was surprised that any observation should have been made on the appointment of the hon. Member for Southwark, because he had on every occasion taken an independent course with respect to the Government.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he had uttered the exclamation referred to by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) not because he objected to his remarks, so far as they were political, for if the noble Lord thought the hon. Baronet could assist his Government, he was glad he had availed himself of his services. But he did complain that such private matters should be brought before the House as where an hon. Member dined, and descriptions of the club to which he happened to belong. Such a course was not calculated to increase the efficiency of the House of Commons, or to further the public interest.

Resolutions agreed to.

"Bill to apply a sum out of the Consolidated Fund and the Surplus of Ways and Means to the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and to appropriate the Supplies granted in this Session of Parliament, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MASSEY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. PEELE."

Bill presented, and read 1^o, to be read 2^o on Monday.

PUBLIC OFFICES' SITE BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH suggested to the right hon. Gentleman that it would be advisable to postpone the further proceedings of this Bill until the next Session. It contained a very important principle, and one which could not be fairly discussed in a House when the attendance was so small as only nineteen Members.

MR. COWPER intimated that the Bill could not be postponed.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that as the right hon. Gentleman did not appear inclined to accede, he must say the Bill was very objectionable. It proposed to vest in the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Buildings a portion of St. James's Park for the new public offices, and one of the provisions of the Bill proposed to give compensation to the Crown for the portion of the Park so to be taken. He contended that the Crown estates were already the property of the public, and were vested in the Commissioners of Woods and Forests and Public Works for the benefit of the public, and the principle of giving compensation to the Crown ought not to be admitted by the House of Commons. It was quite clear that nothing could be done in the erection of the new offices until the next Session, and, therefore, he should move that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House will, upon this day month, resolve itself into the said Committee.'"
—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. AYRTON inquired whether in the erection of the new public offices it was intended to pull down the building recently erected at great cost as the State Paper Office?

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he hoped that the smallest possible portion of St. James's Park would be taken for these improvements.

MR. COWPER said, the Bill was merely a formal Bill, consequent on an Act passed in 1859, giving the Commissioner of Works power to acquire a site, and the way in which the piece of ground would be paid for was merely matter of account between the Land Revenue Department and the Consolidated Fund. The legal title to this Park was not vested in the Commissioners of Works; they had only the management on the part of the public, and the object of the Bill was to give a legal title to the Commissioners of Public Works. The principle contained in the Bill was the same as that adopted in the Lighthouses Act, and it was practically only a matter of account. The piece of ground which would be taken in St. James's Park was part of the inclosure close to Fludyer Street and Downing Street, to which the public had no admission. There was also a road near this enclosure which was used by the residents of the houses close to it, but when those houses were removed the road would be of no use. It was a little piece of useless ground, and would be taken as a part of the new Foreign Office. If the present Bill were to be postponed it would cause an additional charge upon the public Exchequer, and an unnecessary impediment would be placed in the way of commencing the preparations for the building. In answer to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, he had to say that the State Paper Office was to come down, but not in consequence of the present plan.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY asked, whether there was any reason to suppose that the part of the Park to be built upon was a quicksand?

MR. COWPER said, there was not; but even if there were, in the present state of scientific knowledge, and with the use of concrete, builders could make a firm foundation in a quicksand.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD asked how much of the open space would be encroached upon?

MR. COWPER said, that part of the triangular enclosure would be taken which was included within a line drawn from the eastern side of Duke Street and another line drawn from the southern side of Downing Street. It was intended to make an entrance into the Park from Downing Street, which would be a great convenience. The small portion of land would just enable the two fronts of the building to meet in a corner, and it was essentially necessary to the carrying out of the design adopted by that House.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

THE FRESCOES—HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—EXPLANATION.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE begged the indulgence of the House while he made a personal explanation as to what he had said the other evening on the subject of the frescoes in the new Houses of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) had, in his absence, stated that he was wrong in saying that the face of Cordelia, in the fresco of "King Lear," was in a state of decay. He had since taken an opportunity of examining the fresco, and he found that he had committed a mistake in saying that the face of Cordelia was decaying. It was the next picture that was injured—Mr. Watts's fresco of "The Red Cross Knight," where the head of the Dragon was completely gone, the leg of the knight was peeling off, and the arm of the lady he was defending was on the point of altogether vanishing from public view. It was true that the face of Cordelia was uninjured, but the nose of Regan was in a very dilapidated state, and would probably fall off before the recess was over. The right hon. Gentleman said that any man who could use his eyes would see on going through the gallery in what condition the frescoes were. He (Mr. Osborne) had used his eyes and had carefully looked at the frescoes, and he could state that in that ridiculous fresco, representing the English rivers, "Old Father Thames" was in a state of considerable decomposition, and that all the frescoes were in a state that was not creditable to the country. He thanked the House for having allowed him to make this explanation; he withdrew his observations about Cordelia, but he maintained what he had stated with respect to all the other frescoes, and that even the fresco of Lear was in anything but a sound state.

MR. COWPER said, he wished also to make a personal explanation. His hon. Friend appeared in the first instance to have mistaken the face of Cordelia for the face of the dragon. But now that he had made a more minute inspection of the faces of the ladies he found blemishes on that of Regan.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that there is no question before the House.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question, and he would make a single observation or two to bring the vexed question of the frescoes to a definitive issue. There could be no doubt that Mr. Watts's fresco was in a state of considerable decay. So was Mr. Herbert's. The faces of Regan and Goneril were disfigured. As for the picture in the other angle, the figure of Adam was almost obliterated. As for the frescoes of Mr. Cope—

MR. SPEAKER said, he must again remind hon. Members that there was no question before the House.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he made these observations with a view to the question he was about to put. There could be no doubt that the frescoes were in a decaying state, and he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would institute an inquiry during the recess into the causes of the decay, as otherwise injustice would be done to the artist as well as to the country?

MR. COWPER said, it seemed as if an inquiry must be instituted into the facts as well as into their causes, as the accounts were so conflicting. His own impression was that Mr. Herbert's fresco was not suffering from decay. Undoubtedly "Father Thames" was in a bad state as well as Mr. Watts's fresco, but he thought the damages to the others were exceedingly slight. He would be very glad, however, to examine into the matter.

CASE OF THE ORWELL.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY asked, the Under Secretary of State, What instructions the Foreign Office had sent to Sir James Hudson respecting the case of the English ship Orwell, belonging to Messrs. Pearson, of Hull, which had suffered much damage at the hands of the Garibaldian Volunteers, for which compensation had not been made by the Italian Government? The case was this. In the month of August last, the Orwell was chartered at Genoa by Garibaldi to take 100 Volunteers to Sicily, the condition being that the owner should receive £5,000. It appeared that the agents of Garibaldi then seized the ship by force, and went out in her on a piratical cruise. The English Consul, on being informed of the circumstance, telegraphed to the Admiral, and the Orwell was consequently captured and carried to Malta. It was here found that her engines had been totally destroyed, and on application to Garibaldi for compensation a commission was appointed, which recommended that the claim should be paid at once. Since that time the King of Italy had assumed the liabilities of Garibaldi, and the claim was on the point of being settled when Cavour died. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) now asked what had been done in the matter by the Foreign Office?

LORD WODEHOUSE replied that the Orwell had been, as stated by the noble Earl, seized by the Garibaldian Volunteers and recaptured by Her Majesty's ship Scylla; that Mr. Pearson, the owner, had applied to the Foreign Office; and that instructions had been given to Sir James Hudson to afford him all the assistance he could properly give. No accounts had been recently received of the position of the case; but if Mr. Pearson would write to the Foreign Office and state the present position of the affairs, his application would receive every attention; though he could not pledge the Government to interfere officially without a further consideration of the facts as they stood at present.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.—EXPLANATION.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought it but justice to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Public Works to correct an error into which he had fallen in the remarks on the state of public business which he had addressed to their Lordships on Friday evening. On that occasion he said that the Bill for providing the money for the new courts of justice had been passed on Thursday night, or rather at an early hour on Friday morning. He had been informed since that the Bill which had been so passed was not the one which he had supposed, but the Public Offices' Site Bill, and that the other measure had been dropped in the House of Commons. He presumed that the Courts of Justice Building Bill, which stood for Committee in their Lordships' House, would be dropped also, as it was connected with the one which had met that fate in the House of Commons. With regard to the Law Consolidation Bills, he was glad to hear that when they came on for the second reading, it was the intention of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to call attention to the alterations which had been made in them since they left their Lordships' House last Session.

EARL GRANVILLE observed that the Bill to which his noble Friend had referred, as one which he expected to see dropped, had been read a second time, and he could see no reason for not proceeding with it.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the Courts of Justice Building Bill had been read a second time, because he believed it was necessary to read it a second time before the date fixed by the Standing Order as the last on which second readings could be taken; but it was distinctly understood that in reading it a second time the House did not pledge itself to a particular site.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that although the site was indicated by the Bill, their Lordships were not pledged to that particular locality, nor to spend any particular sum of money. But he thought it ought to be pressed forward, seeing that it had met with no opposition in either House. He would explain what alterations had been made in the Criminal Law Bills when the House was in Committee on them to-morrow.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, there could be no doubt that there was a clear and distinct understanding when the Courts of Justice Building Bill was read a second time the other night, that it should not conclude their Lordships to any opinion on the principle of the Bill. He was surprised to hear that it was now intended to press on the Bill after the other Bill for the appropriation of certain funds to be expended in the erection of the new courts had been withdrawn.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, their Lordships would perceive, on looking at the Bill, that neither the neighbourhood nor the site was determined. The Bill gave more power for the acquisition of land for the purpose. The utility of passing it lay in the fact that some £8,000 or £9,000 which had been expended upon the necessary surveys would otherwise have to be repeated next year, in the event of a Bill being passed by the House of Commons devoting a particular sum to the erection of Courts of Justice. If the present Bill passed this amount would be saved in the scheme were proceeded with; but if the Money Bill did not pass, this Bill would by that fact become a dead letter.

LORD DENMAN believed that the proposed Courts of Justice, if erected, would be productive of great public inconvenience. Reversing the old rule that "equity follows the law," all the law courts and lawyers would be obliged to follow equity to an inaccessible locality in the centre of London.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that distinct reference was made in the Bill to the plans and specifications agreed upon by the Commissioners, which referred to districts and houses that were perfectly well known; and power was sought under the Bill "to purchase, take, and use for the purposes of this Act, all or any houses, tenements, buildings, and lands described on the above-mentioned plans." It was, therefore, an error to say that no particular site or neighbourhood was pointed to. Doubts and uncertainties would be excited by this measure in the minds of owners and residents in particular properties, and he thought it a very grave question whether a saving of the cost of preparing the surveys anew might not be dearly purchased by the passing of the present Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, though the site might be indicated, no advantage could be taken until the money was expressly voted for the purpose by Parliament. Two things, therefore, must be done in the next Session before the plan could be carried out—the money must be voted; and if that money were the sniters' money that question must be decided by Parliament.

LORD WYNFORD thought it highly inexpedient to proceed with this scheme in the face of a Treasury Minute stating that the estimate would probably be exceeded by a million.

APPROPRIATION OF SEATS (SUDBURY AND ST. ALBANS) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

tion of Seats (Sudbury and St. Albans) Bill read.

EARL GRANVILLE, in moving that the House do go into Committee on the Bill, gave a short explanation of its objects. The noble Earl was understood to say that, as the practice of the Constitution had provided that the House of Commons should consist of a certain number of Members, the Government had, in the absence of any strong feeling in either House of Parliament in favour of a general measure of Reform, thought it their duty to make a proposal for filling up the vacancies occasioned by the disfranchisement of the boroughs of Sudbury and St. Albans—a measure in the adoption of which two noble Lords opposite were concerned. Their first proposition was that two seats should be given to counties and two to boroughs, and the boroughs selected were Birkenhead and Chelsea with Kensington. That scheme was not accepted by the House of Commons, and as the Bill now stood the West Riding of Yorkshire was to be divided into two divisions, each of which was to have two Members, Birkenhead was to have one Member, and a Member was to be added to the two now possessed by South Lancashire. He would not attempt to anticipate the arguments which might be urged against the Bill, but would at once move that their Lordships should go into Committee upon it.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

LORD STRATHEDEN, after showing that the Government and its supporters were not in any way committed to this measure, since it was not the same the Government had introduced in February, and they had disapproved the changes it received, said, the Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee may be viewed either as intended simply to arrest it, or as implying that its details are in want of such an agency to sift them. In both these lights it is defensible. If viewed in the first light the lateness of the Session is not an argument against it, but an argument in favour of it. The lateness of the Session would prevent a Select Committee from reporting. But the lateness of the Session renders the Committee of the Whole House utterly inoperative. In point of fact it is unwarrantable to proceed with such a Bill at such a moment. The Standing Order of the House year by year has given a formal voice to the legitimate opinion that, after July 25th, meaasures ought not to proceed without reasons urgent and exceptional, and such as, in this case, are well known to be wanting. It is true that it was read a second time on the 19th. But it was read pro forma only. It now comes before us for the first time to be discussed. If the opinion which used to be embodied in the Standing Order, and which still prevails, although from temporary circumstances it has not this year been embodied in it—arrested ordinary Bills, how much more ought it to arrest a plan which, as it alters the Reform Act, must influence the dignity, prosperity, and future legislation of the country? It is unjust to ask noble Lords who, from February last, have patiently attended the business of the House to compromise their health, to waste their powers, and even sacrifice their duties by remaining in town a day after July is ended. And yet unless the Bill is hurried, against all decency and precedent, the day after it is first discussed into a law it must run into August. What is the result? That, to the loss of the community, and to the injury of the House itself, it goes, without consideration and discussion, through its stages. For who can venture to discuss it? If any one, a year ago, had given notice to submit the question to the House of how these seats should be appropriated; if long before that time he had formed opinions on the subject; if he saw the present Bill to be impolitic, and felt an obligation to examine it, in what position would he stand? He would have to choose between the fatal evil of addressing an impatient House and the yet more serious calamity of allowing what he saw to be a legislative error to pass unexposed and unquestioned to the statute book. Although no Member of the House would shrink from any task which duty urges on him, the Government are not entitled to place men in such a difficulty unless necessity controls them. But does it in this instance? In the other House of Parliament the Bill was read a second time on the 25th February. It went into Committee on the 11th June. Was such an interval inevitable? It reached this House on July the 11th, and now, upon the 29th, we are beginning to debate it. Was that interval inevitable? But, setting that aside, is this Bill forced on at this late period by some popular opinion it would not be prudent to resist or disappoint? It is well known that it has not any popular opinion to support it, connected had the honour to propose in 1852, and which was mainly rejected through the influence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who until a short time ago was one of the most prominent candidates for one of the seats which the Bill proposes to create. It is true there is this difference, that we proposed in 1852 to confer two seats on the West Riding and two on South Lancashire. I have a very strong preference in favour of two seats for a county over the inconvenient plan of three; but in 1852 Birkenhead had not risen to the importance which it has now attained, and I can find no fault with the selection of Birkenhead for one of the vacant seats. If, indeed, it were in the contemplation of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a very large or extensive plan of Parliamentary Reform, I think they would be acting most improvidently and unwisely in hampering their discretion by the introduction of this smaller measure. In that case I should think there was some reason in the complaint of the noble Baron, that it would prevent due consideration of the claims of places which have a right to be considered in any general measure. In the measure of 1859, which the Government with which I was connected introduced, not only were all these seats provided for, but provision was also made for other places. The London University, the Scotch Universities, (the borough of Chelsea and Kensington was provided for in a different mode by subdividing the county of Middlesex); and I believe by that Bill the claims of all the principle places for representation were satisfied. But it did not please the different parties to allow that measure to pass, and I certainly bow with submission to the determination at which they arrived, and am perfectly ready to give my support to Her Majesty's Government in adopting and approving this partial measure. I presume Her Majesty's Government have no very extensive scheme of Parliamentary Reform to bring forward; first of all, because I think recent experience has forcibly shown them that small and not wholly independent boroughs are not without their use in the political system of this country. They will not say they are, but I am sure they just now cordially wish that there were "six Richmonds in the field." For other reasons I am inclined to suppose they have no such scheme. The noble Lord—I do not know whether we can yet call him the noble Earl, whom we shall very shortly have the satisfaction of seeing in this House, and whom all your Lordships on every side of the House will rejoice to see here, has expressed very honestly and very candidly his opinion that there is no use in bringing forward a measure of Reform unless there is a strong feeling in favour of it among the public at large, and he left it to be implied that there is at the present moment no such feeling, and consequently no such temptation to Her Majesty's Government. It is not only from what the noble Lord has said, but from what the noble Lord has done, that I augur there is no wish to introduce a Reform Bill, because the noble Lord has selected this precise moment for a change in his position. Like another Astræa, disgusted with the follies and iniquities of the lower world, he has left it. He is about to rise to a higher, a calmer, and, I hope, a purer atmosphere; and I cannot wonder that the noble Lord, who has devoted so much time to the labour of reconstructing the plan and building up the political edifice of the Constitution, should be glad to take the opportunity of finishing the work, and filling up the gaps which for so many years have deformed its beauty, filling up those gaps in the representation by the additions of the West-Riding, South Lancashire, and Birkenhead.

Justitia excedens terris vestigia fecit.*"

This is to be the concluding scene of the noble Lord's efforts in the cause of Parliamentary Reform. I have stated that to the Bill I have no objection to offer, and no doubt it will be on the whole a very satisfactory measure, as soon as it has received a few alterations at the hands of the Committee—first, for the purpose of making it English, and next for the purpose of making it sense. Whatever may be the ulterior views and whatever may be the ultimate wishes of Her Majesty's Government, I seriously hope that what has passed on the subject of Parliamentary Reform in the course of the last two years will be a warning to the present and all succeeding Governments not hastily to bring forward or promise, or still more hastily and inconsiderately to pledge the name of the Sovereign to the introduction of large and extensive measures which they do not feel perfectly confident of being able to carry. There are great and serious evils in the perpetual introduction of Bills which are perpetually rejected, and the Sovereign is placed in an undignified position in pledging Parliament year after year to consider Bills which cannot possibly be passed. In 1858, when I was in office, I felt bound earnestly, seriously, and honestly to endeavour to give effect to pledges which on high authority had been given to the House, and I did apply myself to the introduction of a measure which I hoped would satisfy rational and moderate men. It did not meet with the success which I anticipated. I have no doubt that Her Majesty's Government were equally sincere, but equally failed in success. From the failure of successive measures introduced by successive Governments I hope it will be clearly understood that neither this nor any other Government are under any obligation to deal at any future time with this question, but that it is a question which must be left to the discretion of any Government to introduce or not, and that they are not to be reproached for violating pledges if they abstain from bringing forward a proposal on so delicate and difficult a subject. I have no wish to interfere with the progress of the Bill. In Committee I shall venture to suggest two or three Amendments, but they are entirely consistent with the principle of the measure, which I shall be glad to see receive the Royal Assent.

EARL GRANVILLE:—My Lords, I entirely agree with the noble Earl in the opinion that it would be undesirable to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, and I presume that my noble Friend who moved that Amendment is satisfied with having given himself an opportunity of stating his views on this subject, which I know he has considered very much for several years. This is a measure affecting the constitution of the other House of Parliament, and that House has not thought it necessary to refer the measure to a Select Committee—indeed, it is not usual to refer constitutional questions to Select Committees—and although, no doubt, it is the duty of this House to oppose this or any other measure which appears to it not to be founded on a right principle, yet, if no such objection can be raised, I think your Lordships would naturally be disposed to receive from the other House the details of a Bill which appears to them to offer the best means of filling up any vacant seats in their own Assembly. To refer the Bill to a Select Committee at this time of the Session would be to reject it altogether, and I hope, therefore, that my noble Friend will not persist in his Amendment. As to the Government proposals respecting this Bill, it is agreeable to find that the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) regards them favourably, and I think your Lordships must, at all events, be persuaded that in submitting them we were not actuated by any party motives. Nor were the changes introduced during the progress of the Bill in the House of Commons of a very grave character. The measure remained the same as before, with the single exception that no seat was given to Chelsea and Kensington, and that a seat was instead bestowed on the West Riding. The noble Earl opposite has made a pointed allusion to my noble Friend Lord John Russell. Had I known that it was his intention to do so I would have asked your Lordships to postpone the Bill till to-morrow, when I trust to have the honour of introducing my noble Friend, who has been so gracefully referred to by the noble Earl, and to whom I am sure your Lordships will extend that hearty welcome which is never refused to a man eminent in any line of life, and which I am sure will be given to one who has played so great and important a part in directing the affairs of this country, and who combines with his public eminence a singularly high private character. The noble Earl has told us what should be the conduct of the Government in respect of future Reform Bills, and with great fairness administered a reproof to his own and to the present Government for having introduced Reform Bills which did not meet with general assent. I entirely concur with him that nothing would be more improper, after the experience we have had, than for any Government lightly to introduce a Reform Bill without a reasonable hope and expectation of carrying it through Parliament. I say this, though at the same time I am strongly opposed to all finality, and to the notion that it is impossible to improve the Constitution of the country, believing, on the contrary, that an extension of the suffrage may be most just and reasonable, and may in the most Conservative spirit be accorded to the people. I repeat, however, that, like the noble Earl, I think it would be rash in any Government beforehand, and without reviewing the whole circumstances of the case to pledge themselves to a Reform Bill without having some probable reason to suppose they would be able to carry it. The Amendments suggested by the noble Earl are very slight in their character; they are indeed similar to those of which I have given notice, and I have no objection to adopt them.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then the original Motion was agreed to. House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 (Providing for the Dissolution of the West Riding of Yorkshire).

LORD STRATHEDEN said, that, although the House had, as he thought, unfortunately decided to go on with the Bill, a middle course was open to them. The Bill fell into two parts. By one it was to give two seats at once to South Lancashire and Birkenhead. By the other it gave two, prospectively, at the next general election to the West Riding of Yorkshire. There was not the least occasion for the latter proposition which Clause 1 contained. Common sense revolted at the wanton sacrifice by Parliament of its future right to deal with these two seats, when the West Riding might not for three years come into possession of them. It was loss to the whole country, and was not gain to any section of it. As well might a man part with a fund to some one who received it with the condition of its being locked up in a box for a considerable period. Why did he part at all with his discretion as regards it? No man was so foolish as to think that a necessity existed for appropriating all the seats together. A hundred circumstances might occur all showing the impolicy of giving two to the West Riding as compared with other applicants; and they were now asked not to give them, but to pledge them three years before the favoured party would be benefited by this superfluous and reckless prodigality. He suggested that all the clauses should be struck out until they came to those which are on South Lancashire and Birkenhead.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 7 amended, and agreed to.

Clause 8 (Making Provision for the Issue of a Writ for South Lancashire),

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had to propose an Amendment to this clause. The clause gave the Speaker of the House of Commons the option of issuing the writ at any time before the dissolution of the present Parliament. He had every confidence in the right hon. Gentleman who now occupied the Chair of the House of Commons. He had known him for fifty years; thirty-five years ago they were travellers together, and somewhat later they were fellow-travellers in another sense, being both members of a small but ~~and~~ party known by the name of the "Daly Dilly." He had no idea that the power given in the clause would be abused by the right hon. Gentleman; but a corrupt Speaker might issue the writ to suit ~~any~~ purposes, and might even postpone it till the eve of a dissolution and after a registration had taken place. He thought the time for the issue of the writ should be more definitely fixed, and that no unnecessary delay in doing so should occur. If it took place later than the middle of next month it would interfere with the harvest, and he need not point out the inconvenience of having an election at a more advanced period of the year. He would, therefore, propose, that instead of the words "at any time before the dissolution of the present Parliament," the clause should read, "as soon as may be after the passing of this Act," and that in the next line the word "shall" should be substituted for "may."

Earl Granville

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had no objection to the Amendment.

Clause amended and agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to, with Amendments; the Report of the Amendments to be received To-morrow.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which he said was to settle doubts that had arisen in consequence of a recent decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, and to make the position and privileges of mayors in provincial towns the same in law which they had been in practice since the establishment of municipal corporations. In consequence of the increased facilities of communication afforded by railways it would no longer be insisted upon that magistrates should reside within seven miles of the borough in which they officiated, on condition that they occupied a house or office within the borough; and it was proposed to extend to magistrates in boroughs where no Quarter Sessions were held the same powers with regard to licensing as were exercised in other boroughs where these Sessions took place. A clause to which the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) took exception a few evenings since had been withdrawn. He, therefore, hoped there would be no objection to the Bill.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, many of the clauses of the Bill required modification, and as the matter was not one of pressing importance it ought to be more maturely considered. He objected to the clause providing that mayors should preside at all meetings of magistrates, because a person who had only just been elected mayor might not be the best qualified to discharge the duties of presiding magistrate. The object of this clause was to set aside a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, which was unquestionably right, as grounded on the soundest principles. Why should not the borough justices have the same right as the magistrates of counties who, being obliged for the due conduct of their business to have a chairman, elected that magistrate in whom they had the most confidence, from the knowledge of his character, his knowledge and ability, and habits of business? The circumstance that the office was elective was a great encouragement to the younger magistrates, by study and attention to business, to obtain that distinction. It is true that in counties, due respect would be given to persons of station and consequence in society, if duly qualified, but no more, and the like preference in case of voluntary selection would be given in boroughs. He had a still greater objection to that clause in the Bill which took away the jurisdiction of county magistrates to license in boroughs having no quarter sessions. The object of this clause, also, was of the same objectionable character. It was to overturn a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, which, also, was in his opinion very clearly right—and in cases where those boroughs sent Members to Parliament, the transfer of the power of licensing from the magistracy of the county at large, to the smaller body of the borough justices, who would have local connections, would be likely to lead to the corrupt exercise of that power, for the purpose of obtaining political influence in elections, especially in the smaller Parliamentary boroughs. He had himself on this ground principally opposed a Bill of his noble Friend (Lord Ravensworth) to give the exclusive power of licensing to the magistrates of the borough of Sunderland, some two years ago, and with perfect success.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to defend the provisions of the Bill.

LORD CHELMSFORD thought that there was a good deal to be said in favour of the postponement of this Bill, because he hoped to satisfy their Lordships that in its present state it ought not to pass. The sixth clause had been given up; the second and third had been, as his noble Friend said, introduced to correct a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench; but, surely, it was a strange kind of legislation, when the Court of Queen's Bench had pronounced a decision giving what was unquestionably a true interpretation of the Municipal Corporations Act, immediately to introduce a Bill to overrule that judgment. The provision that mayors should preside at all meetings of magistrates within the borough by virtue of his office, was, in his opinion, unnecessary and contrary to good policy, and would create great dissatisfaction throughout the corporate towns of the kingdom. It was unnecessary, because, as the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill had admitted, mayors were invariably asked to preside at such meetings, and even at Birmingham, from which the complaint in this matter proceeded, that courtesy had not since the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench been withheld from the mayors. It was a violation of principle to take from the magistrates the power of electing their own chairman. As a general rule the person of the highest rank present was chosen to fill the chair; but still the right of choice lay with the meeting, and if any one insisted on presiding as a matter of right it would be resisted. As had been admitted, the mayor was usually elected chairman, except where, as sometimes happened, he was unfit for the post; but the effect of the Bill would be to compel the magistrates to submit to his presidency even when notoriously unfit. Although the magistrates, in nine cases out of ten, voluntarily paid a compliment to the mayor by selecting him, they would naturally resent being forced to do so, and ill-feeling would be apt to be produced by that provision. He, therefore, hoped that the noble Lord in charge of the Bill would not insist upon retaining it.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY observed that the noble and learned Lord had proceeded on the erroneous assumption that the mayor was generally chosen to be chairman as a mere compliment. He believed that the prevailing understanding was that the mayor was ex officio the chairman of the meeting, and such was obviously the intention of the framers of the Municipal Corporations Act. He was of opinion that to confirm that impression by law would be much more likely to remove ill-feeling than to allow the matter to be the constant subject of dispute.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that what he had remarked in conversation on this Bill to the noble Earl opposite was that in his opinion the question of the precedence of mayors was very unimportant, but that he did not see that there would be any great advantage in the Bill in that respect. He added that if Her Majesty's Government were desirous that it should be carried he would not offer any opposition to it. He stated, also, in the same conversation, that it was Clause 6 of the Bill which he deemed most objectionable, and that the question of granting licences was one on which there was a good deal to be said. After that conversation, he felt bound in honour not to oppose the second reading of the Bill, but he held himself at liberty in Committee to deal with the remaining clauses, apart from that on the precedence of mayors, as he thought fit.

On Question? their Lordships divided:—Contents 44; Not-Contents 27: Majority 17.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 2^a, accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House Tomorrow.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVICE) BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

LORD MONTEAGLE complained that this Bill had been brought up to their Lordships at a period of the Session when it was impossible it should receive proper consideration. It was a Bill which ought to have been introduced at an earlier period of the Session, and in their Lordships' House, when and where it could have been more properly discussed. This, and other Bills referring to India, had been needlessly postponed to a period of the Session when it was impossible they could be considered with that weight which their importance demanded. He protested against this mode of transacting public business. By this Bill the pledge which the Government had given to encourage the employment of the Natives was indirectly broken, inasmuch as they had introduced such conditions preliminary to their employment as to render them, generally speaking, ineligible for those offices which it had been intended to open to them. He referred in especial to the grievance which would be inflicted on the Natives of India by their being practically debarred from the army medical service. It was true that there was no express change in the law making them ineligible for these appointments; it was the indirect effect of the amalgamation of the Queen's and the Indian local armies. The ground alleged was their physical incapacity; but in a letter which he had received from a most intelligent Native gentleman the writer said the true cause of this retrograde step was to be found, no doubt, in the foolish prejudice against men of colour. The present measure was, he felt sure, introduced in a kind and friendly spirit towards the Natives, but he wished to insure, if possible, that the spirit of the law—namely, that the Civil Service should be open to the Natives of India, should be properly carried out. He therefore, proposed a clause which would not give to the Natives any new right whatever, but only secured them against the loss of any right which they at present enjoyed, and enacted that the provisions already in force on this subject should be taken to be part of the present Bill, and should be construed with it as confirming the Natives in the rights, privileges, and immunities already granted to them. The noble Lord moved a clause embodying the views he had expressed—

“ Whereas by Section Eighty-seven of an Act of the Third and Fourth of King William the Fourth, Chapter Eighty-five, it was enacted that ‘ no Native of the Territories of India, nor any natural-born Subject of His Majesty resident therein, shall by reason only of his Religion, Place of Birth, Descent, Colour, or any of them, be disabled from holding any Place, Office, or Employment under the said Company:’ Now be it enacted, That the said Eighty-seventh Section shall be deemed and taken to be Part of this present Act, and shall be construed therewith in all respects as re-enacted and continued therein, and as assuring to the Natives of India and all natural-born Subjects of Her Majesty resident therein all the Rights, Privileges, and Immunities granted to and conferred on them by the said Eighty-seventh Section.”

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that the reason why these Bills were not introduced earlier was that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India had decided to wait for the latest and fullest information before the views of the Government were formed. The noble Lord must remember that his words were addressed not to that House only, but to the world at large; it was, therefore, imperatively necessary that the most accurate strictness and the most correct language possible should be employed. The noble Lord had addressed himself to the consideration of two questions which had no connection with each other, except that they related to the Natives of India. Some time ago a question was put by the noble Lord with reference to the non-admission of Native gentlemen to compete for assistant-surgeons. On that occasion his noble Friend the late Secretary of War (Lord Herbert) was present in the House, whose continued absence their Lordships must so deeply regret. He (Earl De Grey) could add nothing to what was then stated by his noble Friend. The noble Lord (Lord Monteagle) said a new construction had been put on the Act of 1833 by the Government regarding the admission of Natives to the Civil Service, and he stated that this had given rise to the greatest discontent in India. Now, the simple fact was that the only branch of the Service from competition for which Native gentlemen had been excluded was that of assistant-surgeons, not to the Native, but to the general army. They were not excluded from the Native army; but it was believed that their constitutions would not fit them for those changes of climate to which the British soldier was exposed, and that they would not if attached to British regiments attract that respect and obedience which it was so important the medical officers of the army should receive. He thought the interests of those gentlemen who had been excluded from this competition might be very safely left in the hands of Lord Canning. This and other Bills would open up for the Natives of India entirely new sources of employment. They were about to be made eligible for seats at the Governor General’s Council, and to places on the bench in the highest court of justice in India, and yet this was the time chosen by the noble Lord for asserting that they were limiting the privileges of the Natives of India. The whole object of the Bill was to open to the Natives opportunities of employment under the Crown, and to legalize appointments hitherto made in contravention of law. If the Indians were discontented after the present debate, it certainly would not be in consequence of any provisions of the Bill. Her Majesty’s Government cordially accepted the enactment of 1833, and had done more than any previous Government to carry out its spirit, but they did not think it advisable to re-enact it, in the terms of the noble Lord’s Amendment, as it might lead to a belief among the Natives on the one hand that the Bill contained some secret and insidious attack upon their rights; or, on the other, that it was intended to do more than the Bill professed, and to open to them all competitive examinations in this country, and to sweep away all the restrictions of the covenanted service. No more unwise course could be taken than to add to a Bill conferring substantial benefits on the Natives of India the vague and general clause suggested by the noble Lord.

LORD LYVEDEN acquiesced in the view taken by the noble Earl (Earl De Grey), whose services had been given with such advantage to India since his appointment to the office which he was now about to vacate; but he maintained that since 1833 the Natives had been systematically misled, as they never practically were admitted into the Civil Service. If Natives were deemed inadmissible they ought to be told so, but it was a mockery to admit them in name, when not a single instance had occurred of their actual appointment.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that it was true that the Civil Service was, by the letter of the law, now open to the Natives of India, but in practice no Native had ever been admitted to that service. It was, therefore, desirable to reinforce and reassure the people of India that we adhere to the sentiments which we had previously expressed, and were anxious that they should be treated as on a perfect equality with Europeans.

Lord MONTEAGLE having said a few words in reply,

Amendment negatived.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE moved an Amendment to the effect that the Governor General should have power to give appointments to persons after a residence of five, instead of seven years, as provided in the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Bill passed.

IRREMOVABLE POOR BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

VISCOUNT LIFFORD protested both against the measure and against the reasons which had been given for adopting it. He had received Returns from a very well managed union in Ireland where the system as to residence was the same as would be introduced into England under this Bill, which showed that while in 1835 the paupers chargeable on the union at large were 1 to 11; the proportion in 1861 was 1 to 2½. He moved to omit from the end of the first clause the words which gave to residence in any part of a union the effect of residence in a parish.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he could not consent to the Amendment. The words proposed to be omitted contained a very valuable part of the Bill, and if struck out would defeat one of the main objects for which the measure was introduced. One of the purposes of the Bill was to mitigate, for it was not pretended that it would remove, the great hardships which arose from the removal of poor persons from one part of the country to another. It was obvious that where there were, as in London, a large number of small parishes, removal from one to another would at present destroy the status of irremovability which a person had acquired. These removals were a great source of expense to the ratepayers, and if diminished would tend to a saving. The arguments of the noble Lord being drawn from Ireland were not strictly applicable, as there was no settlement in that country.

LORD REDESDALE was as anxious as the noble Lord to secure a diminution of expense, but doubted whether that would be attained by the Bill.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON entered his protest against a Bill of such importance being brought forward at that late period of the Session.

Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

LORD REDESDALE said, the question of rating had not yet been fairly and fully considered. On a former occasion he had shown the disproportion between the rating in Berwick and Lancaster. He had since received additional returns, from which it appeared that while in one of the parishes of Croydon there would be, under the Bill, an increase of £1,000 a year, there would be a decrease of £800 in another parish. These discrepancies were very unjust and inexpedient. He thought the Bill would also bear unfairly on the owners of tithes, which, when commuted, were an unimprovable property. He should move the omission of Clause 9, and subsequently move the addition of a clause limiting the continuance of the Bill to three years. The Bill was being passed with a great deal too much haste, and as it was doubtful whether the change would be just it ought to be an experimental and not a permanent measure. The noble Lord proposed to leave out Clause 9.

LORD WODEHOUSE did not deny that the Bill would shift the burden from parishes which were unfairly taxed to parishes which were unfairly exempted, but he maintained that it was a desirable object, and that the omission of the clause would aggravate the inequality, because other provisions in the Bill would bring on the open parishes a still larger burden, and leave those which did not bear their fair share more exempt than before. As regarded unions in two different counties, inequalities might arise from the county assessment being taken as the basis; but, as the county justices could order a new assessment and correct any injustice, he did not deem it a defect in the Bill. With regard to tithes, the Act of 1848 first made a change, and this Bill merely adjusted the burden more fairly. Some tithe owners might have to bear an increased charge, but others would bear a less charge. It could not be contended that the bargain with the tithe owners was such as to preclude Parliament from making any change. He should not consent to omit the 9th Clause, or to make the Bill temporary. They had been passing temporary Acts for fifteen years, and the time was arrived when they were bound to render their legislation permanent. As to the Bill being passed in haste, he would remind their Lordships that in the other House it had received a great deal of consideration, and that their Lordships being well acquainted with the subject could have proposed Amendments if they had thought them necessary at any of the previous stages.

Question put, "Whether the said Clause shall stand part of the Bill."

Resolved in the Affirmative.

LORD REDESDALE then moved "at the end of the Bill to add the following Clause: 'This Act shall continue in force for Three years only.'"

Amendment put, and negatived.

REMOVAL OF IRISH POOR BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S said, the Bill only proposed to amend the machinery of removal. According to the existing law the poor were sent over to Ireland, badly fed and badly clad, and often landed on a quay, and there left to find their way to their places of destination as best they could. A Committee of the House of Commons on the subject sat in 1854 and 1855, presided over by Mr. Baines, then Chairman of the Poor Law Board; and another Committee in 1858, 1859, and 1860, presided over successively by Mr. Sotheron Estcourt, Lord March, and Mr. Villiers, the latter also Chairman of the Poor Law Board. The Bill was founded on the recommendation of both those Committees; it had passed the Commons, and he hoped their Lordships would also agree to it. This was peculiarly a favourable time to pass the measure; for whereas, in 1850, 77,000 persons landed at Liverpool from Ireland who were manifestly paupers, in the last year only twenty-one such persons from Ireland so landed at Liverpool. He meant not 21,000, but twenty-one individuals only. So that the cost of the removal of the Irish poor would now be exceedingly small. The object of the Bill was that they should not be left destitute on the quays, but be passed to their abodes.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

In reply to Lord REDESDALE,

The EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S suggested that alterations, if needed, could be made in Committee.

ASSESSMENT OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What are the rules which have been laid down at the Home Office with respect to recommending, or otherwise, commuted allowances towards the payment of rates for Government property in certain parishes?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the rule laid down was where the Government property bore a considerable proportion to the assessable property of the parish, and the subtraction of that property from the parish assessment seriously affected the payment of rates due from the ratepayers, to allow a contribution towards the rates.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he wished to know what was the exact proportion laid down as a fixed rule?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there was no exact numerical proportion laid down.

CASE OF THOMAS CARTER.

QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Thomas Carter, who was, on Monday, the 15th of day of July, brought before Thomas Thorpe Fowke and Le Marchant Thomas, Esqrs., at the Ryde Police Court, charged with being a vagrant and sleeping in the open air at Oakfield, and who was committed by those Magistrates to Winchester Gaol for three weeks, and ordered to be kept to hard labour for that period; and, if so, whether he has given, or intends to give, orders for his immediate release?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, a letter was written from the Home Department at an early period of last week requesting the committing Magistrate to send a Report in the case of Carter. That Report had not been received at the Home Office.

and a second letter was written on Friday last, reminding the Magistrate that he had not sent a report, and requesting that it should be sent. No report has yet been received, and that morning he (Sir George Lewis) had caused a third letter to be addressed to the Magistrate.

THE GALWAY CONTRACT.

QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, What are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to renewing Postal Communication between Galway and America?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the House was aware that the Contract had been put an end to. The Report of the Committee who considered the subject had been circulated, and was in the hands of Members; but the Evidence taken by the Committee was not yet printed, and until the Government had an opportunity of considering not only the Report but the Evidence also, he was not in a condition to state what might be the intentions of the Government with respect to the future. He had, however, no objection to repeat what he had stated on a former occasion, that it appeared to him, generally speaking, to be advantageous for the commercial interests of the United Kingdom at large to have the most rapid communication possible with Newfoundland, whence there was telegraphic communication with the continent of America. The question would naturally be what point of the United Kingdom was best adapted for that communication? He thought that, geographically considered, Ireland was, and that the most suitable part of Ireland was the west coast. Perhaps the hon. Member would not object if he added that Galway, being the most central point of the west of Ireland for communication by railway with any part of the United Kingdom, appeared to him (Viscount Palmerston) prima facie to be the most desirable place for the purpose. But all these were matters which the Government had to consider, and he could only say, in the absence of the evidence, that he was not able to intimate any specific intention on the part of the Government.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask if the noble Lord would undertake to give an answer to the Question which had been put to him before the close of the Session?

Sir George Lewis

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could not undertake to do that, as that the matter was one of considerable importance.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, I rise to move the postponement of the second reading until the Bill be printed and in the hands of Members. A great many assertions have been reiterated last year with regard to the fact that it is the peculiar function of the House of Commons to look after all Money Bills, and to superintend the application and appropriation of the funds which come out of the pockets of the people. This responsibility—and, undoubtedly, it is a serious responsibility—certainly rests upon this House alone. Last year we refused to allow the House of Lords to share it. But, if this be our peculiar function, how do we exercise it? If this responsibility rests upon us, how do we discharge it? If this trust be imposed upon us, and on us alone, do we fulfil that trust intelligently and honestly? What is the real state of the case? The Lords, part of whose duty this is not, have refused to vote for the second reading of any Bill until it is in the hands of Members; they object to pass a measure without knowing what that measure is. But what is our practice? Year by year this Bill has been allowed to pass the second reading; to go through Committee, to pass the third reading, and eventually to pass the House without having been printed and put into the hands of Members. The House, consequently, could not be aware whether it was in the correct form or not—whether it contained the restrictions and restraints demanded by the Constitution, or whether certain clauses were omitted so as to give the executive a full scope, and an uncontrolled sway, over the funds of the country. It had been urged that it was useless to print this Bill, as it was always exactly in the same form every year. Was that the case? In the first Session of the year 1857 (to go no further back) the Appropriation Bill contained the usual Appropriation clause. But the Appropriation Bill of the noble Viscount's Government, passed in the second Session of that same year, contained no such clause; it even had a clause (§ 26) which repealed the Appropriation Clause of the Bill of the preceding Session. What was the consequence? The sums that were voted by Parliament were exceeded. The army grants were exceeded by £1,050,000, and the navy grants by £133,383. This money was not only spent without the sanction of Parliament, it was expended against the expressed wish of this House; yet, as the usual clause had been omitted from the Bill, no remedy was left in our hands. Again, in the first Session of 1859, the usual Appropriation Clause was contained in the Appropriation Bill of Lord Derby's Government. It was passed, however, without having been in the hands of Members; but the Lords refused to let it go to the second reading without having been distributed. In the second Session of that year, when the noble Viscount had come into office, the Bill was again brought in without the Appropriation Clause; and it again contained a clause (§ 22) which repealed the Appropriation Clause of the Bill passed by Lord Derby's Government. And what, again, was the result? The army at the end of the year was found to contain 11,500 men more than had been sanctioned by Parliament; and in order to meet this additional expense, the War Department appropriated other funds to the purchase of military stores: they took £200,000 which had been voted for the building of iron ships; and £519,000 which had been voted for transports. This Appropriation Bill did not contain the usual Appropriation clause; and yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, in reply to the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey), that it was in the usual form! The Chancellor of the Exchequer is not perhaps to be much blamed for this, because this Bill is never prepared in his office. Neither he, nor any of the Ministers, are more able than any other Member to know whether it be correct or not. They cannot, therefore, be responsible to the House for its correctness; they cannot answer for its containing the necessary restraints over the executive. But then this fact proves the whole case which has to be made out; if the Ministers cannot be answerable, then clearly we must have the Bill in our own hands; and we must not allow that responsibility, which we would not permit the House of Lords to share with us, to devolve upon some subordinate officer of the House of Commons. It has been objected that to print this Bill would occasion both a loss of time and an increased expense. But both these objections are easily answered. For the Bill must be printed before the Lords will receive it; and it is well known that the difference, both as to expense and as to time, between the printing of six copies and the printing of 600, is very slight indeed. Besides this, six copies of the Bill have actually been printed, and lie in the office; and yet they refuse to issue them to Members. This is, indeed, a matter of great importance. But the question assumes a far greater magnitude when the constant tendency of all our legislation during the last few years is taken into consideration. Any one who will glance at the pages of a very able periodical which is edited by Mr. Toulmin Smith, must come very quickly to the conclusion that a centralizing tendency prevails in nearly every Bill which is brought before the House. We seem to be getting very fast into the bureaucratic system which caused the great French Revolution of 1792. Formerly the whole government of the country was carried on at parochial boards and by county authorities. Even the taxes were collected in the parishes by parochial officers, and handed into the Treasury by the sheriffs of the counties. The farmers and gentry who executed these functions received no payment; they did it all as a labour of love, or rather as part of the duty which they owed to their country. Now, these local boards have been replaced by central boards in London; and paid officials have taken the place of unpaid farmers. Thus it is that the Civil Service Estimates have been so enormously increased. This, however, is a minor matter, and does not bear upon the question before the House. What is of far greater importance is this: these farmers were not at all under the influence of the Cabinet; they always did that which, after mature discussion, seemed best for their own parish. It made no difference to them which party was in power. Now, on the other hand, the paid functionaries who have taken their place are appointed by the Minister, are paid by the Government, and can be removed by the Minister. They are, therefore, entirely at the beck and bid of the Minister: they are all in his power. The tendency of modern legislation is to establish more of these central boards, and to increase the number of these functionaries. Thus the patronage of the Minister is being continually augmented. He is daily getting things more and more into his power. We are, in fact, gradually drifting into an oligarchy, and settling down under the irresponsible control of a Cabinet—a body not recognized by the Constitution. I do not bring this forward in a party spirit. The one side of the House is no more to blame than the other. The tendency of our legislation has been the same whichever party has been in power. The front bench on your left, Sir, as well as that on your right, seeks to increase its own power and augment its irresponsible control. The Conservatives used to pride themselves upon defending the local self-government and fighting for the ancient municipal institutions of the country. But we, too, have lately been tempted to centralize as well as our opponents. But, Sir, if this be so, is it not more than ever important that the House should prevent the Cabinet from obtaining also an irresponsible control over the funds supplied by the people, by omitting all those restraints which the Constitution has imposed? Should we not try to stop a system which has been so silently but so steadily growing and gathering strength? Our forefathers were very particular about this matter on which we have grown so lax. Just after the Revolution of 1688, Lord Somers framed some Appropriation clauses with the greatest care. But it is wrong to call that period a Revolution; for it was not a subversion of the Constitution—it was a return to the ancient state of things, and a revivifying of the Constitution. During King James's reign an oligarchy had obtained an irresponsible power. But there was this difference between that time and our time: the cabal of that day shrank the people of their liberties, but did not infringe upon the prerogatives of the Crown. The Cabinet of this day robs the people of their ancient liberties, and also arrogates to itself the prerogatives of the Crown. In 1688, when the ancient liberty was again restored, Lord Somers—the mention of whose name is enough to command respect for all he did—drew up certain Appropriation clauses, in order to bar any future infringement of the liberties of the people in that quarter. A Parliament was summoned and passed this Act. It is the 1 Wm. & Mary, s. 2, c. i. The Appropriation clauses (§ 45–53 and § 55) were not repeated in subsequent Acts, but were referred to in the following stringent terms:—

printed may not be diverted or applied to any other purposes than are hereby declared and intended. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the rules and directions appointed and enacted in one Act (1 Will. & Mary, s. 1) intituled ‘An Act for granting to their Majesties an aid of two shillings in the pound for every year, for the speedy payment of money then granted into the receipt of the Exchequer by the collectors and receivers, and for the distribution and application thereof and keeping distinct accounts of the same and all other provisions, penalties and forfeitures thereby enacted in case of diversion and misapplication of any money thereby appropriated, are hereby revived and enacted to be in force and shall be practised, applied, executed, and put in use for and concerning the distribution and application of the said money hereby appropriated as fully, amply, and effectually as if the same were here again particularly repeated and re-enacted.’”

When this good practice fell into desuetude I cannot state. But at the present day the clause which is in vogue is as follows:—

“The said Aids and Supplies provided as aforesaid shall not be issued or applied to any use, intent, or purpose whatsoever other than the uses, intents, and purposes before-mentioned or for the other payments, appropriation, or application directed to be made or satisfied thereout by any Act or Acts or any particular Clause or Clauses in that purpose contained in any other Act or Acts of this Session of Parliament.”

That is the clause which is given in Mr. May's Practice of Parliament, p. 558. This was a matter upon which our forefathers exercised a great deal of strictness. A reference to the Journals of the House will show that Edward Seymour, Esq., Member of this House, was impeached on Saturday, Nov. 20, 1680, for eluding the Appropriation Act. A Committee was appointed, which reported on the Thursday following. And the House passed a Resolution declaring that such a misapplication is a sufficient ground for impeachment. On May 15, 1711, several Resolutions were passed to the effect that the application of even an unexpected surplus is a misapplication of public money, it not having been previously sanctioned by Parliament. On Jan. 12, 1784, a Resolution was carried, declaring that even after Votes in Supply have been passed, yet for any Minister to sanction the payment of these without an Act of Appropriation previously passed—

“Will be a high crime and misdemeanour, a daring breach of a public trust, derogatory to the fundamental privileges of Parliament, and subversive of the Constitution of this country.”

In latter years, however, this House has become far more negligent and lax. For in 1845 a clause was introduced into the Appropriation Act by the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) to give the Treasury power to alter the relative amounts of the grants for the army and navy, provided the whole sum total were not exceeded. Yet on March 30, 1849, the following Resolution was carried :—

"When a certain amount of expenditure for a particular service has been determined upon by Parliament, it is the bounden duty of the department which has that service under its charge to take care that the expenditure does not exceed the amount placed at its disposal for that purpose."

We learn, also, from Mr. May's Practice of Parliament, that it used to be customary to vote an instruction to the Committee on this Bill to receive a clause of Appropriation; and that this practice was discontinued in 1854. Thus it was that we find an entry in the Journals to the effect that the title of the Bill had been changed in Committee. For instance, in the Journals, vol. 109, p. 479, there is this entry—

"Mr. Bouverie reported, That the Committee had gone through the Bill, and had amended the title thereof; which title is as followeth :—A Bill to apply a sum out of the Consolidated Fund, and certain other sums, to the service of the year 1854, and to appropriate the Supplies granted in this Session of Parliament."

It will be seen at p. 473 that the original title of the Bill did not contain the words "and to appropriate the Supplies," &c. Thus, until the year 1854, the House of Commons took measures to insure that the Appropriation Bill contained the usual restrictive clause; but since that time the Bill has not been printed and placed in the hands of Members, although there is no security that the usual form of the Bill is maintained, and the House remains in ignorance whether the Bill contains the Appropriation Clause or not. In 1857 and in 1859 it was omitted. On March 11, 1861, the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) moved an Amendment to the question that you, Sir, do leave the chair, which he withdrew on obtaining a distinct promise from the Government that they would not alter the Appropriation of any sums. Nevertheless, as the Bill is always drawn without their cognizance, this House should ascertain that the Bill is in the proper form, and should not allow such an important responsibility to devolve on a minor officer of the House. If, therefore, we desire honestly to discharge this responsibility; if we would fulfil the trust imposed upon us by our constituencies; if we would redeem some of the many pledges which we have given, or if we would but emulate the self-respect entertained by the Lords and refuse to be led blindly in the dark, then we shall insist upon getting this Bill into our hands before we vote that it be read a second time. We, on this side of the House, glory in the name of Conservatives. Of what are we Conservatives, if not of the ancient practice of local self-government and of the time-honoured municipal institutions of the country? Those on the other side of the House profess a love of liberty and call themselves the friends of the people. Are they friends but in name and in empty profession—merely verbum tenus amici?—or do they entertain any real anxiety to defend and preserve the rights of the people? If so let both join in stopping the progress of a baneful system which has been silently but steadily growing.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "be" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "not read a second time until it has been printed and in the hands of Members," instead thereof.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that about five years ago a clause had for the first time been introduced into the Appropriation Act calling upon the Government, on the presentation of the Army and Navy Estimates to mention a deviation which might have taken place in the expenditure from the objects for which the money was voted in the previous year. He wished to know whether such a clause was contained in the present Bill?

MR. THOMSON HANKEY felt obliged to the noble Lord, the Member for Huntingdon, for having brought the matter forward. He, however, took objection to the Bill on other grounds than those which the noble Lord had stated. He had obtained a return of the amounts voted in Supply and in Ways and Means in 1860-1, with an abstract of the manner in which those amounts were set forth in the Appropriation Bill of 1860-1. It showed that the sum £60,123,174 had been voted and paid, and what he wished was that it should be made intelligible in the Appropriation Act itself what were the amounts that had been voted in Committee of Supply. He had taken the liberty of suggesting a mode by which the Act could be made more intelligible by an alteration of the marginal reference. As they were given at present he would defy any Member to make out the total amount which had been voted during the year. What was the objection to the alteration? He had made inquiry of the officers of the House, and was referred to Mr. Jones, who said he could not alter anything in the Appropriation Act, not even the marginal references, without the sanction of the Speaker. He had referred to the Speaker, and was given to understand that the alteration could not be made under the present form of procedure. He could not understand what the objection to the alteration was. It seemed to him to be a very simple thing. It did not interfere with the body of the Bill, but simply with the marginal references, and he should be very glad to hear what was the objection to it. He thought hon. Members should be able to understand what were the sums voted and what had been done with them from the Appropriation Bill itself; but he hoped, at least, in the beginning of the next Session the finance accounts would be in the hands of Members so as to enable them to understand the application of the sums voted.

GENERAL PEEL wanted to know out of what funds the sum of £206,000 voted the other night as excess of military expenditure had been paid. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his financial statement at the commencement of the Session, stated that it would not be paid out of the revenue for this year. It could not have been paid out of the Vote of Credit of last year, because that Vote, according to the Appropriation Act, was applicable only to the payment of sums authorized by Parliament last Session. The charge must have been met in some way or other, and he should like to know in what?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there could be no doubt about the question of military excess. What he stated in his financial statement was that no provision would require to be made for that excess in the finance of the present year, inasmuch as it consisted of money which had been already paid. He did not understand the gallant General to dispute the fact that it had been already paid. Of course, therefore, it could not enter into the finance of the present year, having been paid out of the issues of the year to which it now stood as an excess. [Mr. PEEL: 1860-61.] His right hon. Friend, who understood the matter, would probably explain it to the House. He did not think that the observations of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) with respect to the Appropriation Bill were applicable to the present stage of that measure. The hon. Member thought that the structure of the Bill might be improved. That was a matter well worthy the attention of the House, and all he could say was that any suggestion upon that subject would, doubtless, be favourably entertained at the proper time — namely, either in a Committee on the present Bill, or upon some convenient occasion next Session. The noble Lord opposite (Lord R. Montague) had truly stated that it was not for the Government but for that House to say how the Appropriation Bill should be dealt with. For his own part, he did not object to the Motion of the noble Lord on the ground of expense, because the question of the cost of delivering 600 copies of the Bill, if it were desirable on public grounds that it should be so delivered, was an utterly unimportant consideration. His objection to the Motion was one of a very different character. When the noble Lord said that the Bill should be delivered, he did not, of course, mean that it was to be regarded simply as so much waste paper. The noble Lord, doubtless, intended that it should be carefully examined by hon. Members, and that the multitude of figures which it contained should be subjected to a rigid investigation. For that purpose some time must be allowed; because a Bill of thirty-four pages could not be presented to hon. Members in the forenoon, and they should be asked to discuss it in the afternoon; in fact, what with the time which must necessarily be given to the officers who prepared the Bill, and to the printer who printed it, and that which must be allowed to hon. Members to consider its various clauses, he probably was not far wrong when he stated that five or six days must be interposed between the Motion for leave to introduce the Bill and the Motion for the second reading. Such was the addition which, if the Motion of the noble Lord were agreed to, must be made to the length of the Session. Now, everybody knew that when the Appropriation Bill came on there was a very great, and certainly a very natural anxiety on the part of hon. Members that it should be proceeded with from day to day, and therefore the real question before the House was whether the Session should be lengthened by about a week for the purpose of enabling those who might feel inclined to check the figures contained in the Appropriation Bill. The practice which the noble Lord now sought to introduce had not been adopted in cases where it might have been acted upon without adding to the length of the Session. No proposal was made to print the Consolidation Bills passed during the course of the Session, though they gave authority to the Government to issue £27,000,000; nor had the noble Lord required 600 copies of the Exchequer bills Bill to be delivered to hon. Members, though both of these might have been printed without interfering with the length of the Session; but in the only case in which the noble Lord proposed to have the Bill printed there would be that inconvenience which, according to the present course of business, would, he feared, be thought a very serious one by the House. At all events, he would suggest to the noble Lord that, instead of making such a Motion as the present, he should bring the matter forward at an earlier period of the next Session, when the House would have the opportunity of considering fully the amount of inconvenience likely to be incurred. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) estimated the advantages from the course proposed very low, but that might not be the opinion of the House, and it would be for the House, and not for the Government, to lay down the course of procedure in matters of this kind. The apprehensions of the noble Lord on account of the liberties of England were mainly connected with the fact that in two particular years one of the clauses of the Appropriation Bill, which the noble Lord called the Appropriation Clause, was omitted. But if any clause in particular was to be called the Appropriation Clause, it was plain that it was not the clause which the noble Lord mentioned, but the 10th Clause, which provided that the monies coming into the Exchequer should be appropriated, and were thereby appropriated as the House had directed. His impression was that that clause, although it might be inserted as a declaration of constitutional principle, was, in point of law, mere surplusage, because the Government had no authority to appropriate those monies to any other purposes than those for which Parliament had appropriated them. In other years to which the noble Lord referred, a difficulty arose in connection with the wording of that particular clause on account of the fact that there had been two Parliaments in both those years—1857 and 1859—before the Appropriation Act was passed, and that was the ground of the omission of the clause. He would therefore suggest to the noble Lord, if he thought the subject worthy the attention of the House, to bring it forward on a future occasion, when the House might see how to reconcile those views with its convenience, which he thought was that the prorogation should take place as soon as possible after the Supplies had been granted.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire was very complete according to the present mode of conducting business; but the question was whether that mode was the proper one. The effect of the noble Lord's proposal would, no doubt, be practically to prolong the Session for a fortnight, but why should it be necessary to bring in the Appropriation Bill the moment the last Vote in Supply had been taken? In his opinion at least a fortnight should be interposed. The proper mode of proceeding would be next Session to determine beforehand how this part of their business should be transacted. If his noble Friend would at the commencement of next Session propound a scheme, or move a Committee for the purpose of devising the best scheme for arranging the business of Supply, so that the House should have an opportunity of comparing the Appropriation Bill with the Votes of Supply, he would be conferring an important service, and would deserve the thanks of the House.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that if the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer proved anything, it proved that the Appropriation Bill was perfectly useless. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said they were bound to vote for the second reading of an Appropriation Bill, of which they knew nothing, merely because the Government managed matters so badly that hon. Members might be kept in town for a period that might not be convenient. He wanted to know why the Appropriation Bill was to be dealt with upon a principle different from other Bills? It was generally understood that they ought not to be called upon to vote for the second reading of a Bill which they had not read over. Now, he said that this Bill was of so much importance that the business of the House and country should be managed in such a manner that the Bill could be dealt with as other Bills, and Parliament ought not to be called upon to vote for a thing which they knew nothing about. This Bill was not a mere blank sheet of paper, but was a measure intended to put an actual check upon the way the money voted by Parliament was expended by the Government—it was very different from the Consolidated Funds Bill, for the simple reason that it was an Appropriation Bill. The noble Lord had been asked to bring the matter forward next Session, and to propose a scheme of his own. Now, though it might be very well left in the hands of the noble Lord, yet it was the duty of the Government to take it up, and he should like to have a pledge from the Chancellor of the Exchequer or some other Member of the Government to that effect.

MR. HENNESSY wished to know who was responsible for this Bill. Unlike other Bills, it did not state by whom it was prepared and brought in.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It was brought in by Mr. Massey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Peel.

MR. HENNESSY: It is not so stated on the back of the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It so stated in the Order-book. The Bill is only in proof.

MR. H. BAILLIE would not recommend his noble Friend to withdraw his Amendment unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer was prepared to give some pledge that such an irregularity as he thought had now taken place should not recur. It might be for the convenience of Gentlemen on the Treasury bench that Parliament should be prorogued as soon as possible; but, so far as those who sat on the Opposition benches were concerned they were quite prepared, if necessary, to sit there for a month longer, in order properly to transact the business of the country.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that no irregularity whatever had occurred. The Appropriation Bill had been prepared and introduced just as its predecessors had been for the last fifty or one hundred years. The form was prescribed by the House, and no sort of objection had ever been taken to it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were, it seemed, quite prepared to sit another month longer; but what advantage would there be in sitting another month in order to do something in a different mode from that which had been the invariable practice of that House, and to which no substantial objection could be urged?

MR. SPOONER reminded the right hon. Gentleman that the subject had been discussed last year, and if his memory did not deceive him, a pledge had been given that the irregularity which then occurred would not be repeated. If the Appropriation Bill were not a farce, he hoped something would now be done to correct what he thought a serious anomaly.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS apprehended that the Votes in Supply during the Session were the real appropriations, and constituted the substance of the Appropriation Bill. The Votes were brought by the Executive Government before the Committee of Supply and discussed in Committee, and each Vote was, in fact, an appropriation. But, technically speaking, it was necessary to have an Act of the Legislature, and in order to that the Votes were combined in a Bill appropriating them to their several destinations. The preparation of that Bill had always been considered, very properly, the act of the clerks of that House. It involved nothing but a clerical function. There was nothing in the Bill on which any discretion could be exercised. It had never been until lately the practice to print even a single clause; but a few years ago there was a request made that one or two clauses might be printed, and they were printed. To represent the present mode of proceeding with the Bill as an innovation and unconstitutional was a simple delusion, and as wild a chimera as ever entered into the brain of any Member of the House.

MR. AYRTON thought the objection to this mode of proceeding came very properly from the noble Lord, who he believed, was a descendant of the illustrious financier with whom the Appropriation Bill originated. It was certainly important to observe that the Bill had been altered in its terms without the knowledge or sanction of the House. ["No, no!"] He was merely stating what was a matter of fact; and the denial only showed how necessary it was, as a matter of precaution, that the Bill should be printed. He thought the reasons alleged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer against that course were conclusively in favour of the recommendation of the noble Lord, for the House had been degraded during the last two Sessions by the course pursued by the Government of postponing Votes in Supply to so late a period of the Session, when they were hurried on, morning and evening, without Members being able to give that attention to them which it was right they should give. He really thought the Bill should be printed in order that the Government might be compelled to submit the Votes in Supply at a period when they could receive due attention. He could not agree that a Vote in Supply authorized the expenditure of public money. That could only be done by Act of Parliament, and since the Votes had been thus hurried by the Government it was highly necessary that the House should possess the opportunity afforded by the Appropriation Bill of again taking the sense of the House on any particular Vote which had not been properly considered at the time it was passed. He was astonished at the doctrine laid down by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis) and denied that the Bill was a mere form. It was, he apprehended, quite competent for a Member to challenge any of the Votes in the Bill, and to divide thereupon. It might not be desirable to divide the House upon the present occasion; but he hoped that the noble Lord at the head of the Government would in a future Session bring forward the Votes at a proper period, so that there was time to discuss them. If the representatives of the people possessed any function in that House, it was surely that of checking the frightful expenditure and the extravagant waste in which the Government now indulged.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: There can be no greater aggravation of an injury than to accompany it with mockery, and there can be no greater injustice than for those who have inflicted an injury to make that injury a subject of reproach to those who have suffered by it. The hon. Gentleman reproaches the Government with not bringing on the Votes in Supply at an early day, and finishing them sooner than at present. That reproach comes from independent Members, whose interposition of preliminary Motions every night upon which we go into Supply raises the interminable discussions which are the real cause of our finishing Supply so late. I must say that is a reproach which I think, upon reflection, my hon. Friend will find applies to other parties than the Government. We began Supply as early as we could, and if it has spun out until the end of the Session it is because hon. Gentleman—and I do not blame them—having a great number of topics to call attention to, select the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair to go into Committee of Supply as a fit opportunity for raising discussions. I do not blame them, but still we ought not to be reproached for the delay. The hon. Member also found fault with us for saying that a Vote in Supply is an authority to issue the money. No one doubts that the moment a Vote in Committee is passed the Government is empowered to spend the money. It is quite true that for the purposes of audit the preliminary sanction of the three branches of the Legislature is necessary, and that is what the Appropriation Act gives; but that Act does not alter a single Vote. It is a record of past transactions, and does not afford the House an opportunity of altering any Vote. No one supposes that in the Appropriation Act we can increase or diminish any Vote. It is simply a form that is required by the Constitution, but it is not a Bill to give rise to any discussion.

MR. HENLEY thought, from the time the conversation had taken, that they were getting into an awkward position. The Prime Minister told them they could not deal with any article in the Appropriation Bill. He (Mr. Henley), on the contrary, thought it was competent for any Member to take the sense of the House upon every one of the items in that Bill, and for the House to determine whether it should be struck out or not. The Secretary of War as well as the Prime Minister spoke of the Bill as a mere form; but that was putting the question in a strange and inconvenient light. An hon. Gentleman made a Motion upon going into Supply the other night, which the Speaker ruled to be out of order, and he (Mr. Henley) then said publicly, and without contradiction, that the hon. Member could raise the question upon the Appropriation Bill. If the Bill was a mere form, and the Exchequer was entitled to issue money simply upon a Vote in Committee, that was a view for which he was not prepared. It would have been better if this question had been raised earlier, so that the officers might have had time to prepare the Bill for printing; but he could not see what difficulty there would be in preparing the accounts as the Votes passed through the Committee of Supply. It was not as though the whole of the Votes in Supply were reported in the last nights of the Session, for most of them had been reported long since. He hoped, however, that his noble Friend would not press his Motion upon this occasion. It would probably be convenient to adopt some course like that he had suggested at the beginning of the next Session. He thought the Prime Minister hardly felt the importance of the statement he had just made; he had always understood it was the privilege of any Member of the House to propose to strike out a money Vote on any stage of the Appropriation Bill.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON explained that he did not at all dispute the power or right of the House to make any alteration it pleased in a Bill as it passed through its several stages; but it had never been a custom, by alterations in the Appropriation Bill, to rescind the previous acts and Votes of the House.

PUBLIC OFFICES SITE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH protested against the power taken by the 2nd Clause of the Bill. It gave compensation to the Land Revenue for the transfer of any premises, being public property, that were required under the Act. It was monstrous that a department should be compensated for the transfer of public property required for the site of public offices. If the principle were applied in this case, it might be applied to all property.

WILLS AND DOMICILE OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that it would perhaps be convenient before making the formal Motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair, if he were to extend the few preliminary observations he had to make to the Bill which stood next in order, namely, that respecting the Wills of Personalty by British subjects dying abroad, as no description of that measure—which had much in common with the other—had been given on the second reading; the object of the Bill first in order was to obtain, by convention with such foreign Governments as might think proper to join, a definition of what "domicile" was. The question of domicile had of late forced itself into a good deal of notice before the various tribunals of this country, especially in connection with the wills of British subjects made out of this country. The rule was that the law of the country of a person's domicile at the time of his death should govern the distribution of the personalty left behind him; and very nice questions had arisen as to whether a British subject had at the time of dying or making his will, as the case might be, acquired a foreign domicile, or still retained his British domicile. Much disappointment had been suffered by persons who were entitled in fairness to the property, by the difficulty and expense of having the question decided; and, after all, the decision had often been very unsatisfactory. It would, therefore, be a great advantage if the question "What is domicile?" were settled once and for ever. That, however, could not be done without conventions with foreign Governments, because the tribunals of different countries might take different views. A uniform rule was the main object of the present Bill. It provided that where a convention should have been entered into no British subject resident at the time of his or her death in a foreign country should be deemed, or admitted, under any circumstances, to have acquired a domicile in such country, unless such British subject had resided there for one year immediately preceding his or her decease, and had also deposited in a public office of such foreign country a declaration in writing of his or her intention to become domiciled in such foreign country. This would give most satisfactory evidence of the animus of the testator, by a solemn and deliberate act; and to this part of the measure he apprehended no objection would be raised. There was a corresponding provision with respect to foreigners dying in this country. Then there followed an independent provision of a very valuable kind, to the effect that after a convention on the subject had been made it should be lawful for the Queen in Council to order that whenever a subject of a foreign country should die within the dominions of Her Majesty, and there should be no person at the time of death rightfully entitled to administer

to the estate of the deceased, it should be lawful for the consul, vice-consul or consular agent, of the foreign State to which the person belonged, to take possession of the property. The advantage of the corresponding arrangement to this country would be that when a British subject died in a foreign country without a representative on the spot, the British consul would be warranted by the convention in taking possession and administering the property for the moment, and so to provide for the decent interment of the deceased, and prevent any spoliation of the property. Now, there was a Bill standing in the orders, immediately below this, which had come down from the Lords. It was entitled, "Wills of Personalty by British Subjects," and had also reference to those wills as affected by domicile. The object of that Bill was to put an end to the law that the validity of the will depended upon the law of the domicile of the testator. But if the Bill first in order should pass, the evils and mischief arising from the doubt and difficulty of defining what constituted domicile would be very much mitigated; because there would be an authoritative declaration of domicile ratified by convention with foreign Governments. The framers of the Bill with respect to wills of personalty by British subjects abroad had in view the evils resulting from the application of the provision that the law of domicile was to govern the will; but the House, he anticipated, would be of opinion that this second Bill, to which he was referring, went too far, and would produce mischiefs and dangers beyond the evils it was intended to remedy. By this Bill it was provided that the will should be sufficient if made according to the law of the place where it was executed, or the law of the place where the person making the will was domiciled, or the law in force in any part of the United Kingdom. Thus, a London merchant who had never set his foot across the border, going to Paris or Naples, and making his will there, might make his will either according to the law of England or of Scotland. Why should an Englishman having a domicile of origin in England have a choice of this kind? Some years ago great pains were taken to settle the law of wills in England; and if this Bill from the other House became law that measure would be to a considerable extent repealed. A British subject, for example, might be travelling, and, having been some time on the Continent, he might have written an informal instrument in the nature of a will. That instrument, being found among his effects, although it might not have complied with the formalities of the English law of wills, nor have been intended to be a will, yet, as the instrument might be conformable to the testamentary law of the country—Norway or Sweden, for example—in which he might be travelling, would acquire testamentary validity under the Bill from the Lords. He believed, however, that the Bill he had first mentioned, which had reference to the wills and domiciles of British subjects abroad, would on all hands prove of advantage and facilitate future legislation. He would suggest to his hon. and learned Friend (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) who had charge of the "Wills of Personalty by British Subjects Abroad Bill," not at present to persist in pressing the measure on the House. They would thus have an opportunity of seeing the effect of the first Bill before discussing the second measure. He trusted his hon. and learned Friend would, at all events, defer the second Bill for the present.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that he had listened with great surprise to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, who, without any explanation regarding the state of the law, or of the necessity for amendment, and without any real reasons assigned—on grounds entirely fallacious—called upon the House to approve of the Bill he had brought forward himself, and called upon him (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) to withdraw a Bill which had passed through the House of Lords with general assent and approbation. The attention of both Houses of Parliament had been called to this important subject in 1857 and 1858. The then Attorney General (the present Lord Chancellor) brought forward a Bill, unlike the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General in some points, though certainly with the same object; but as it appeared to be entirely inadequate to the ends proposed, and left the law as unsettled and uncertain as it was before, it did not receive the approbation of the House, and was not pressed. With regard to the Bill which had been introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Kingsdown—the Wills of Personalty by British Subjects Abroad Bill—which his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General suggested that he should withdraw, he begged to remind the House that in 1857 a Bill much to the same effect not only received the approbation of the House of Commons, but was approved of by the present Prime Minister and the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It was also approved of and supported in the other House by Lord Clarendon, who at the time held the office of Foreign Secretary. It would have passed the House of Lords but for the lateness of the period of the Session at which it was introduced. Again, in 1858, the Bill was re-introduced and passed without opposition in that House, and received the approbation of the then Ministers of the Crown, though subjected to some slight criticism of the Attorney General. It was sent to the other House, but fell a victim to the rule of not receiving a Bill, except of great urgency, at a late period of the Session. The Bill which his hon. and learned Friend now called upon him to withdraw, having been introduced into the House of Lords by the high authority of Lord Kingsdown, was referred to a Select Committee of that House, and underwent a most searching examination. It was unanimously adopted by that Select Committee, and passed the House of Lords with the entire approbation of the Ministers of the Crown in the Upper House. He would attempt to explain in a few words the grievances which arose from the existing state of the law. Some thirty years ago a decision was pronounced by the Court of Delegates, happily no longer existing, which, upon the faith of an old maxim, entirely inapplicable to the circumstances of the present times—mobilia sequuntur personam—determined that the will of a British subject domiciled in a foreign country must be made according to the law of the country of the domicile at the time of testator's death. Thus things stood until the other day, when a British subject made a will in Paris, having an attorney sent from this country for the purpose, and executed it according to the law of England. The case went before the Privy Council, and there the testatrix was held to have died domiciled in Paris, and the will was declared invalid. The effect of that decision was this, that every British subject who made his will, whether in this country or in any other, if it should turn out in the opinion of a jury or of a Court of Probate that that person had acquired a domicile at the time of his death in a foreign country, and that the will was not made according to the form of law prevailing in that country, the will was void. That decision would have a most mischievous effect on many wills made of late years. If a British subject, having made his will in England according to the law of the land of his birth, went abroad, a jury or Court of Probate might hold that he went abroad with the intention of permanently residing there, that he had his domicile abroad, and that, consequently, his will was void. Thus, not only was a person bound to ascertain the law of the country in which he had acquired a domicile, but he was bound to foresee at the time of making his will what would be the country of his domicile at the time of his death. Very great difficulties must arise from this state of things, for scarcely two Judges sitting on the bench were able to agree as to the law of domicile, as it depended not only on what a man might do, or say, or write, but upon his intention, or what was passing in his mind. The Bill of which the Attorney General had moved the second reading made the validity of the will of every British subject to depend upon the question of domicile; because it provided that a convention should be entered into with foreign countries, under which no person was to be held to have acquired a foreign domicile except by a continuous residence of one year before his death; unless he should have made a formal declaration in writing that he desired to transfer his domicile to the country of his residence. He appealed to his hon. and learned Friend himself to say whether there was any question arising in courts of law in this or in any other country that was attended with greater difficulties and perplexities than the law of domicile. The Bill of the late Attorney General (the present Lord Chancellor) proposed to make an amendment of the law in this respect, which at present was fraught with mischief and inconvenience, to depend upon treaties or conventions being entered into with foreign countries, and upon offices being established abroad, at which a person was to state his intention to acquire a domicile. He (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) considered that such a Bill was entirely inadequate to the ends proposed, and that it must necessarily continue for a long period of time, perhaps for ever, all the mischief and inconvenience arising under the present law. But, on the other hand, the object of the Bill introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Kingsdown was simple, plain, and clear. It proposed that no genuine will made by a person who believed he was disposing of his property as he had a right to do according to law, and who made it according to the law of any part of the United Kingdom, or of the country in which it was made, or of the country in which the testator had acquired a domicile, should be rendered ineffective because he might at last die domiciled elsewhere. He heard with some surprise the statement of the Attorney General, that the provisions of the Bill of Lord Kingsdown were at variance with the international law of Europe. He said, without fear of contradiction, that the effect of that Bill would be to make the law of England conformable to the public law of Europe. He also ventured to assert that, according to the public law of Europe, every will was valid which was made according to the law of the country in which it was made. The improvement in the law which the Bill now before the House was intended to effect was made contingent upon treaties which might never be entered into, and which even if effected would leave the law attended with all the evils which were completely remedied by the Bill of Lord Kingsdown. He did not, however, object to going into Committee on the present Bill if it were the wish of the House.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER rose to move that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day three months. He very much regretted that while taking that course he had not the benefit of having among his auditors the present Lord Chancellor, who was so much in the habit of accusing those who differed from him of ignorance; because if the noble and learned Lord were present he might enlighten the House as to the principle on which his Bill was founded—although he (Sir George Bowyer) defied either the noble and learned Lord or anybody else to prove that it was founded on any principle which could be clearly understood by a legal mind. There was, however, no use in indulging in idle regrets, for the noble and learned Lord had gone beyond recall to enlighten the ignorance which existed in “another place.” The House must, therefore, make the best of the Bill in his absence, and he should with the permission of hon. Members draw their attention to its preamble, which referred to the question of the validity of wills made abroad and the disposition of personal property by means of such instruments, according to the law of England, and recited that the same could not be amended effectually without the consent and concurrence of foreign States. That he denied. He maintained that the law of England made effectual provision in the matter, and was fully competent to do so, and that the first and second clauses of the Bill could be carried into effect without a convention, and that, consequently, the preamble was founded upon an allegation entirely groundless in point of law. No convention with a foreign country was required to alter the law as administered in the courts of England. It was said that a convention would be necessary for the purpose of determining the domicile of a foreigner resident in this country. He denied that proposition, because the law of a country was supreme within its own territory, and it was competent for Parliament to determine without a convention under what conditions a foreigner resident here should be admitted by the English law to be domiciled in England. He ventured to say that if the Foreign Secretary were to ask any foreign Government to enter into a convention with us on the matter he would be laughed at. Then there was another absurdity in the Bill. The Bill provided that by a declaration in writing a British subject resident in a foreign country should be able to declare that he was domiciled in that country, and that such declaration should have the effect of proving him so domiciled. No Act of Parliament was requisite for that purpose, because domicile was a question of intention and of fact rather than of law. The law was sufficient as it stood. What the Bill did it did injuriously, because it excluded all proofs except a declaration in writing. He thought that a very mischievous interference with the law of nations, because it provided only one proof of domicile and allowed of no other. Perhaps the Solicitor General would tell him that a convention was necessary in the case of British subjects dying abroad and leaving property in a foreign country. But for that purpose no Act of Parliament was necessary; it could be done by treaty. There was not a case in fact which made such an Act as this necessary. He believed if the Bill passed it would be for the most part a dead letter. It was, moreover, open to the objection that it fixed the errors in the English law at present. He repeated that by the law of nations the domicile of the testator had nothing whatever to do with the question. Vattel, as quoted by Storey, clearly laid down that the forms and solemnities required for the execution of a will were the forms and solemnities required by the law of the place where the will was executed, and not by the law of his domicile. He objected to this Bill because it tended to perpetuate the greatest defect in our law—the doctrine that the validity of a will depended on the law of domicile. The law of domicile ought not to be allowed to defeat the will of a British subject resident abroad, because the validity of a will depended by the law of nations, not on the law of domicile, but on the law of the place where it was executed. If a will were executed according to those forms and solemnities required by the lex loci, it was valid all the world over. Lord Kingsdown's Bill was based on the soundest principles of public law and practical utility; but he did not see how it was possible to place this Bill and that of Lord Kingsdown together on the statute book. He moved that this Bill be committed this day three months.

MR. HENNESSY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that there was nothing in the two Bills in the least inconsistent with each other, and each might be discussed with perfect convenience on its own separate and independent merits. The Bill before the House dealt with the subject from a point of view entirely distinct from that involved in the other Bill. The Bill from the Lords dealt with the question what authentication should be necessary to establish the factum of a will; the Bill before the House dealt, in all the clauses except the last, with the question what authentication should be necessary to establish the factum of domicile with respect to the subject of personal succession. The Bill which was next to be submitted to them applied only to cases in which a man dying abroad had made a will, but did not apply to the important question of succession in cases of intestacy. Therefore, the House might decide on both Bills without any conflict between the two. There would be great advantages in passing this Bill on the supposition that foreign nations would be willing to enter into conventions on this subject with this country. If they would not the Bill would fail: but he could not see why foreign nations should object. It might remind the House that during the present Session it had passed a Bill which provided that, by means of conventions precisely similar, questions of foreign law might be sent to foreign countries, in order that the law of those countries might be stated for the guidance of the courts of this country. He wished the House to consider the advantages which would be gained if such conventions were entered into. In the first place, all must have observed what extreme inconvenience would arise from introducing local laws affecting the succession of personal property into particular countries—laws which would not be recognized as to the personal property of the same persons in other countries. Though it might be true that in some countries, as to the authentication of the instrument, the lex loci had been permitted to prevail, yet his hon. and learned Friend (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) could not mean that in the distribution of the estate and the succession to personal estate the law of domicile was not universally regarded. Therefore, it was quite clear that in dealing with the really important question of the distribution of the estate, the succession to property, and not the mere authentication of the instrument, they could not escape the necessity of attending to the law of the domicile. The fixing of the domicile was at present a question of the most extreme difficulty. The whole history of a man's life, from his birth to his death, was constantly the subject of investigation with a view to ascertain it. Lord Kingsdown in the House of Lords referred to the enormous expense incurred in prosecuting those difficult inquiries, and mentioned an instance in the courts of this country in which the costs amounted to £30,000. The object of this Bill was to reach that difficulty. As to the distribution of the estate, whether a man died testate or intestate, the other Bill was silent altogether; but this Bill reached the cases both of testacy and intestacy, and also dealt with the subject of domicile so as to get rid of all the enormous sources of expense which existed in the present state of the law. It was proposed by the mutual consent of this and of foreign countries to require certain necessary evidence of the fact and of the intention—of the fact, a certain length of residence; and of the intention, a declaration made for that purpose. It prescribed a method of proving

Domicile animo et facto. At present many persons were compelled to die intestate, because neither France nor England would recognize the law of domicile acted upon by the other. This was a serious evil, of extensive operation, and he believed that the Bill of the Government would provide an ample remedy; whereas, if the other Bill only were adopted this evil would be left untouched. Under these circumstances he thought the Bill ought certainly to be allowed to go into Committee.

MR. ROLT said, he did not think it had been shown that this Bill would accomplish the desired object. It depended on conventions for its success. What probability was there that any conventions would ever be made? Foreign countries did not act upon our view of the law of domicile, and, therefore, it was not very likely that they would enter into conventions upon the subject. He admitted that it was necessary to do something, but this Bill would only prevent effectual legislation. There was no difficulty in doing what it proposed to do without conventions. The Solicitor General spoke of reciprocity, but had not pointed out how that was to be obtained. Supposing a convention was made with France, that would not in any way meet the case of a British subject dying in Spain. Therefore it would be necessary to make this measure effectual, that we should have conventions with every other country. He objected to this Bill because some legislation without the necessity of conventions would be easy, while the effect of passing this measure would be to hinder such legislation. He regarded the Bill as useless, uncertain, and ill-drawn, and, therefore, he thought it ought not to be passed.

MR. MALINS adopted the same view as his hon. and learned Friend; but while he desired that this Bill should not pass, he desired that the other should; though he admitted that there was no necessary antagonism between the two. That there was a necessity for some legislation upon the subject of the law of domicile there could be no doubt, and in proof he might refer to the case of the Southampton Charity, in which £30,000 or £40,000 had been spent in ascertaining the domicile of Mr. Hartley, the testator, at the time of his death. He thought that if a will was drawn in conformity with the law of the country where it was executed it ought to be regarded as a good will. The Bill which had come down from the House of Lords was based upon that principle, and, if passed, could come into immediate operation, while this Bill required conventions to make it operative. He (Mr. Malins) would not oppose the passing of this Bill, if the Government would undertake not to oppose the passing of the Bill which was to follow. In proposing this, himself and his hon. and learned Friend must have credit for disinterestedness, as nothing led to more litigation and expense than questions as to wills. The short Bill sent down from the Upper House swept away a mass of legislation on the subject, and simply stated what the law would be hereafter, at least in reference to personal property. He would be willing to postpone the consideration of the subject till the next Session, if he could be assured that no cases of difficulty, expense, and hardship would occur in the interval. But there could be no guarantee against the operation of the ordinary law of mortality; and since the Bill of the House of Lords would effect an immediate and useful amendment, and the Bill of the Attorney General did nothing antagonistic to it, he trusted his hon. and learned Friend (Sir George Bowyer) would withdraw his Motion, and allow both Bills to pass as a kind of compromise.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that, no doubt, the operation of the Bill was contingent on foreign Governments doing that which the Bill proposed in order to arrive at a settled decision as to what was a legal domicile. As to the reciprocity, what he contended was that in the absence of a convention they would still find variance in the decisions of the Courts of different countries; whereas, if a convention were made, there would be a settled principle as to domicile. The hon. and learned Baronet, the Member for Dundalk, questioned the accuracy of the proposition that by the law of nations, not only the distribution of movables, but the solemnities of the execution of the testament depended upon the law of domicile; that opinion, however, was supported by Lord Wensleydale and the other law Lords in the case so often referred to; who said that not only the distribution of the movables must be dependent on the law of domicile, but that the will itself must be in the form prescribed by the law of the country in which the will was made.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS did not know whether the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) meant to take the opinion of the House on the subject, nor was it actually of much importance whether he divided or not, for there was no chance of the measure becoming law this year. Still, on such a question they ought to be fully persuaded of the grounds on which they supported or opposed the Bill. He would state as briefly as possible his strong objections to it. First, the Bill assumed that the proper way to regulate the succession of property by will was to alter the law as to the domicile. On the contrary, he thought the proper mode was to bring the law of this country as to wills into agreement with the law of other countries, and to make a testamentary disposition good, provided it was in accordance with the law of the country where it was made, and disregarding the question of domicile altogether. His next objection was that the Bill provided a system that would be utterly ineffectual if no conventions were made, and which, if they were made, would establish a system more complex than anything at present existing. He did not know how many foreign States there might be in Asia, Africa, and North and South America; but in Europe alone some fifteen or twenty conventions would be required with first, second, and third rate Powers. A man would have to travel with a book like Hertslet's Treaties, in order to know whether he was in a State with which a convention had been made with Great Britain on the subject of wills. But, practically, a man would think nothing about it. Testators, again, would omit to go through the formal process of lodging the declaration with the officer named in the Bill. The Attorney General had spoken of the convenience of defining domicile. He would agree that whoever should produce a correct definition of domicile would be a benefactor of mankind. But the present Bill did not define domicile in any way. It only said that there should be no change of domicile until there had been a residence in another country for one year. There would be no statutable enactment to define domicile, and after a convention had been entered into and the process defined in the Bill had been gone through it would still be necessary to show the animus of the testator by the evidence of letters and conversation, as at present. Suppose, too, some testator died abroad in Spain, leaving personal property in France or America as well as England, the Act would only apply to the countries with which we had conventions. Did the Attorney General suppose that other countries would not adhere to their law on this subject! The measure was, in fact, a complicated piece of machinery. It affirmed an erroneous principle, and he must enter his protest against its further progress.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Malins) had suggested that the opposition to this Bill should be withdrawn on condition that the Government should make an objection to the second Bill also passing through Committee. He had no hesitation in accepting that proposal, so far as the present stage was concerned. The House might pass both Bills through Committee to-night, and when they came out of Committee they would be better able to judge of the desirableness of proceeding with the second measure.

SIR FITZROY KELLY thought that that course would be the most advantageous one to adopt.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that under those circumstances he would withdraw his Amendment.

WILLS OF PERSONALTY BY BRITISH SUBJECTS BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR FITZROY KELLY moved that the House go into Committee on this Bill. He would not trouble the House by entering into an exposition of the objects intended by the Bill further than to say that this Bill was not intended to invalidate wills already made; but its result would be to give effect to solemn acts done by British subjects in foreign countries, wherever the will was a genuine one, so that the intention of the testator might be carried into effect.

House in Committee.

Clause 1, (Wills made out of the Kingdom),

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved to leave out the words at the end of Clause 1, to the effect that in the case of an Englishman losing his English domicile it shall be presumed that his will was not made in England.

SIR FITZROY KELLY declined to accept the suggestion. The Amendment would strike at the principle of the Bill.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS moved that the latter portion of the clause should be amended by providing that the will should be valid if it were framed in conformity with the law of that portion of Her Majesty's dominions in which the testator had his "domicile of origin."

MR. BOVILL thought the clause as it stood was best.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER also thought that it would be better not to make any change in the clause. If the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast were adopted a will made abroad according to the Scottish law by an Englishman having property in Scotland would be invalid as regarded that property.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to; as were the remaining Clauses.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT (1854) CONTINUANCE BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BRADY expressed his opinion that, instead of preventing, it rather tended to produce corruption at elections. He moved the omission of the first clause altogether.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the only clause in the Bill was that which continued the former Acts.

MR. BRADY then moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. COLLINS opposed the Motion.

MR. BRADY said, that he would not persist in his Motion; but must enter a protest against the principle of the measure.

In reply to Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH,

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had little doubt the Bill would have to be introduced again next Session.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

LANDED ESTATES (IRELAND) ACT (1858) AMENDMENT BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. PEEL proposed to insert the following clause:—

"Whereas Lieutenant-Colonel John Henry Keogh has sustained a loss of £1,879 6s. 7d. by the neglect of an officer of the Encumbered Estates Court; and whereas it is expedient that he should be indemnified for the said loss; be it, therefore, enacted that the Judges of the Landed Estates Court may, with the sanction of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, direct the payment to the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Henry Keogh, from time to time, out of the duties levied or to be levied under the provisions of the said recited Act, of an amount not exceeding the said sum of £1,879 6s. 7d.; and no general order reducing the said duties shall be issued until there shall have been received after the passing of this Act from the proceeds of the difference between the existing duties and the reduced duties to be levied under this Act a sum amounting to £1,879 6s. 7d."

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS opposed the clause. The object of the fees paid in the Landed Estates Court was merely to make that Court self-supporting, but now it was proposed that the suitors should pay more fees, in order to make good the loss sustained by the neglect of one of the officers. The effect of such a principle was to make all the suitors mutual insurers against the mistakes of the officers of the Court. This would establish a most vicious principle in regard to all Courts, and would render the establishment of such a Court in this country impossible.

MR. PEEL said, that the case was a peculiar one, and it had been proved to the satisfaction of the Committee that Colonel Keogh had been compelled to pay the sum it was proposed to give him twice over. He thought that both in this country and in Ireland the course now proposed had been adopted under analogous circumstances, and the Committee had recommended that Colonel Keogh should be indemnified in this manner.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, that the Secretary of the Treasury had certainly made the case more clear, and more objectionable than it seemed before. There had been no instance in which Parliament had given its sanction that the fees of suitors should make good an error in judgment of one of the officials. The principle upon which suitors were compelled to pay fees was to make the Court self-supporting, but, unfortunately, the principle was not strictly adhered to. He did not doubt that Colonel Keogh ought to be reimbursed; but he did altogether deny that he ought to be reimbursed out of the pockets of those who might hereafter become suitors in the Encumbered Estates Court. It was, in fact, levying a tax on future suitors to pay for a loss incurred in reference to bygone suitors. There was an admission that the fees would bear reduction, but this reduction must be postponed to pay for the errors of an official. The Committee were not empowered to say whether this money should come out of the Consolidated Fund or not; all they were called upon to decide was, whether Colonel Keogh ought to be remunerated or not. The question of the fund out of which he was to be paid was one for the consideration of the House. He should ask the Committee to expunge the clause altogether.

Mr. BRADY asked what would be done after this claim was liquidated. Other cases might arise like this of Colonel Keogh. Would those payments in future come out of the Consolidated Fund?

Mr. PEEL said, he could not state the course that would be pursued in future cases. The necessity in this case arose out of the legislation of the House. It must be remembered that the principle had never yet been carried out of making this Court self-supporting.

Mr. VANCE supported the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast. The result of the clause would be for some years to come to keep suitors out of the Court.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 25: Majority 8.

Mr. HENNESSY wished to ask the Chairman a question. The title of the Bill was to alter the duties in the Court; but the 3rd Clause said that the Commissioners might raise the duties as well as alter them. Under such circumstances, he desired to know, whether it ought not to have been introduced by a Resolution in a Committee of the Whole House?

THE CHAIRMAN said, as the Bill did not intend to make any charge upon the

Sir Hugh Cairns

Consolidated Fund, it was not necessary to proceed by Resolution in a Committee of the Whole House. The duties proposed to be raised were to come out of the suitors' fund. He thought, however, that the title of the Bill would require amendment by the addition of some such words as these, "and for other purposes."

Clause added to the Bill.

Preamble, as amended, agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

PAROCHIAL OFFICES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. C. P. VILLIERS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was recently decided by the Court of Queen's Bench that overseers were not entitled to apply any portion of the poor rates to the building or hiring of any place in which to transact their business. Great inconvenience had resulted from that decision, especially in populous parishes, and the object of this Bill was to enable overseers, with the consent of the vestry, and also of the Poor Law Board, to apply a portion of the poor rates to the purpose he had stated.

Mr. HENLEY said, the measure might be needed in towns of 5,000 inhabitants, but thought it would lead to extravagance if the principle were extended to towns with only 2,000.

Mr. C. P. VILLIERS had adopted the limit of 2,000 in consequence of the wording of a former Act defining a "populous place," but had no objection to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for To-morrow.

OFFICERS OF RESERVE (ROYAL NAVY) BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Lord CLARENCE PAGET, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he had been asked to give some explanation of its provisions and the necessity existing for such a measure. In any debate which might follow his remarks he was sure his brother officers of the Navy would join with him in avoiding any observations which could be construed offensively towards the merchant service, as remarks, made unintentionally he was quite sure, in "another place," had given great annoyance to this excellent and gallant body of men, whose co-operation they sought to obtain in the defence of the country. The officers of the mercantile navy proposed to enrol themselves as officers of Naval Volunteer corps, formed on a principle somewhat similar to those which had been so successfully carried out on land; and the Admiralty had accepted their patriotic proposal with a warm desire, which he had no doubt was shared by the public, to avail themselves of the services of the gentlemen composing the officers of the merchant service. For this purpose Her Majesty's Government had prepared a Bill which he had now the honour to propose, enabling those gentlemen to enrol themselves, so that in the unfortunate event of unforeseen war they would assist the officers of the Navy, either in large ships of war under the command of captains or commanders, or in charge themselves of smaller vessels. It was right he should state that there was not a single word in the measure, or in the regulations which would accompany it, which could be taken by the officers of the Royal Navy as in the slightest degree infringing on their dignity or interfering in the slightest degree with the flow of promotion. The Bill simply empowered Her Majesty to receive the services of these officers, and provided for the footing on which they should be placed while at drill or on actual service. Some time ago the Admiralty issued a form of regulations under which officers would be eligible for the Naval Reserve. A great meeting of officers in the merchant service followed; and, having been invited to express their opinions, they raised certain objections which he believed had been entirely obviated in the amended regulations which he should be happy to lay on the table if any hon. Member would move for them. At their request the rule requiring that no masters should be admitted as lieutenants of the Naval Reserve who did not hold extra certificates under the Mercantile Marine Act of 1850, or the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, had been modified, and a much less stringent qualification was now required, though sufficiently strict at the same time to ensure that the officers in question would be men of sufficient education and experience to undertake the duties imposed upon them. The only other point to which the masters of the mercantile marine objected was that of rank, holding that it would be unjust for an officer who might command, for instance, one of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company's fleet—a vessel of equal value and requiring as skilful handling as a ship of war—to be placed under the command of a very young lieutenant of the navy. Such a contingency was one that could very rarely occur, as the number of officers in the merchant service commanding vessels of that class must be limited, and in case of war they would probably receive command of some small vessel—of the class, he meant, which would ordinarily be commanded by a lieutenant in the navy. But it must be apparent to all that masters in the mercantile marine could not expect to take rank above commissioned officers in the Navy; in such a case the latter would have fair ground of complaint. The rule with regard to corresponding rank was followed in the Volunteers and the Militia, and it was impossible to suppose it could be departed from in the Naval Reserve. Practically he did not believe such a contingency as that referred to was likely often to arise; but in case it should ever do so in actual warfare officers of the mercantile marine would be swayed by motives of patriotism, and would not, he was confident, stickle on this point of dignity—there could be no clashing whatever between the two services. The lieutenants of the Reserve would rank with, but after, the lieutenants of the Royal Navy, and merchant officers might, in his opinion, be well content with the honourable post of holding commensurate rank with lieutenants of the Royal Navy. The question of rank, as he had stated, was the only point of difficulty. It had been said “in another place” that there was no necessity for this measure, and that if a war broke out we could easily find officers. He (Lord C. Paget) said it was a measure of absolute necessity. We had at this moment something like 850 lieutenants, yet there was scarcely at this time of peace one unemployed who was able to go to sea. What would occur if a war broke out to-morrow, and that in the event of casualties we had no means of reinforcing the fleet with young lieutenants? In these days gunnery was absolutely necessary. A lieutenant who knew nothing of gunnery was absolutely useless. What was proposed was to give the merchant officers of the Royal Naval Reserve an education in gunnery. They would have to take a course of gun-drill on board the training ships. They would read the various books on gunnery, and make themselves thoroughly acquainted with gun-drill. What he hoped was the Admiralty would then place on board the large merchant ships officered by these men a gun or two, and ultimately every man in the merchant service would become a gunner. He might be sanguine, but he looked to that day when they might have on board these large merchant ships a system of gun-drill under their own officers, and that thus when war broke out the officers of the merchant navy would bring with them large bodies of their men already drilled and made efficient. He was not prepared to say that they could have educated more sailors of the Royal Naval Reserve than they had done. The training ships had been fully employed with the 5,000 and odd men who had come forward, and if they had come forward more largely he did not know that they could have accomplished more than had been done; but it would be most important to educate the officers of the merchant service in order that they might in turn become the instructors of their own men on board their own ships. Then, if they got this great Navy Reserve they would be able, in some degree, to reduce the vast expenditure of the navy. If, at this moment, there had been a reserve of 30,000 officers and seamen, they might safely reduce the great amount of the Vote No. 1, in the estimates for men. He sincerely hoped officers of the navy would favour this scheme; and, on the other hand, that officers of the merchant service would come forward like their fellow-subjects and devote themselves, as it might become necessary, to the service of their country. He could not sit down without alluding to an establishment now formed for the education of officers in the merchant service, and which he thought would be of very great importance in the future as regards the naval resources of the country. He had gone down to Liverpool some weeks ago to inspect a school established by the Mercantile Marine Association for young officers for the merchant service. He found there 100 young gentleman admirably educated, of the highest respectability, preparing as officers of the merchant service on board the Conway. He was bound to say they were entirely equal, in every respect, to the cadets at the Naval School on board the Britannia at Portsmouth. They were being instructed not only in the higher branches of astronomy and navigation, but in gun-drill, and he saw with pleasure a vast body of young officers who would by-and-by be perfectly fit to take part in vessels of war, and whose services would be invaluable to the navy. He looked forward to the time when these schools would be established at the principal ports; so that the young men from the merchant service would be perfect gunners; thus, in the event of war, largely increasing the means of manning our fleets and assisting us most usefully in officering the navy. He trusted the old standing antagonism between the merchant service and the Royal Navy would now be broken down, and that the distinguished officers of the merchant service would, as on former occasions, even when they were pressed men, acquire great glory in the naval service of the country. It was also to be remembered that after service these officers were qualified to become officers in the Royal Navy itself. He trusted if ever the time came when these men were called on many of them would become distinguished officers of the Royal Navy. He begged to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: Sir, I must disclaim all feeling of illiberality in the few remarks I may offer in relation to the Bill now submitted to the House to enable Her Majesty to accept the services of officers of the merchant service as officers of Reserve in the Royal Navy—quite the contrary—I desire to profess what I truly feel, a high respect for their character and profession, but I am at a loss to understand how this Bill can work with advantage to the object designed, directed as it is to the admission of 130 masters and 270 mates, under the qualifications stipulated for their admission. Let me ask how can you place confidence in having the command of the services of these officers at the moment you necessarily will require them on the immediate outbreak of a war, when probably the greater number will be absent from England on foreign voyages or otherwise not forthcoming? I am, therefore, constrained to observe, looking to a certain provision and wise caution, it were far more prudent than to rely on a source so hazardously uncertain for officering your fleet, to establish year by year a regular supply of cadets equal to the demand contemplated and which must occur, to offer certain employment and the opportunity for distinguished service to the officers of the Royal Navy, who, at all times, have been found ready to devote the best portion of a man's life to the profession, and to surrender the most attractive opportunities of acquiring wealth to the realization of an honourable renown in the service of the country. The noble Lord observed that these officers of Reserve might be employed in small vessels of war in sole command, but it is right he should bear in recollection that it is this very description of vessels, and in gun and mortar boats, that the lieutenants of the Navy rely upon selection for command, in war time, affording the most certain means by which they may secure promotion and acquire honour—permit me, likewise, to observe that the Naval officer entered the service in his earliest youth. He had to submit to a severe course of study and a most rigid examination to qualify him for high rank, having to obtain a practical knowledge of seamanship, navigation, gunnery, and steam. He was subject to be sent to all climates, and was liable to all contingencies of service, being oftentimes separated for a considerable number of years from his family, and having to perform continuous service in unhealthy climates, whilst his sole encouragement lay in chance-promotion to high rank and the acquisition of a distinguished name. The officers of the Mercantile Navy were placed in far more independent circumstances, and had far greater opportunities of securing a competence both present and future. They were not subject to the same risks, the same dangers, or the same deprivations, nor had they to serve so frequently or so continuously in unhealthy climates. If these officers of Reserve were to be placed in the service, the masters to take rank immediately after lieutenants, and the mates to sub-lieutenants, in what position, may I ask, were the masters in the Royal Navy to stand whose rank invariably had been with lieutenants, but subordinate in command to them? a most meritorious class of officers who ought not to be deprived of the rank they now hold next to lieutenants. In the event of a war our commerce would be immensely restricted, when we should experience no lack of officers of the merchant service or of merchant seamen, in number as they were nigh of 200,000, and I am confident, in such a crisis, if England be threatened from them, our seafaring population will spring up a host of Volunteers to the Navy to uphold its ancient reputation, and the honour and glory of the country. I shall not oppose this Bill, but I do most earnestly entreat that in carrying out its provisions the just claims and feelings of the officers of the Royal Navy will be scrupulously regarded.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he did not think there was any great urgency for passing a measure which had been so little considered, and, therefore, he had hoped that the Bill would not have been persevered with this Session. Considering the large number of officers now upon our Navy List, there was, in his opinion, no occasion for such a measure. Upon the Active List for July there were 101 admirals, 343 captains, 445 commanders, 844 lieutenants—the First Lord of the Admiralty said the other night that there were 855—and 126 sub-lieutenants, making a total of 1,859; independent of masters, engineers, mates, and midshipmen. From the masters we might, on an emergency, obtain lieutenants, who would be far more efficient for the purposes for which they would be required than would the officers of the mercantile marine. On the Reserved List there were 97 admirals, 96 captains, 124 commanders, and 408 lieutenants, making a total of 725 officers; or, together with those on the Active List, a grand total of 2,584—a number, he believed, larger than that possessed by all the other nations of the world put together. America had no admirals, 100 captains, 130 commanders, and 362 lieutenants—total, 592. France had 54 admirals, 103 captains of line-of-battle ships, 230 commanders, and 700 lieutenants, making, with a considerable number of aspirants and élèves, who answered to our mates and midshipmen, a total staff of 2,207. Of our lieutenants, whose number he stated at 855, the First Lord of the Admiralty said the other night that only 150 were unemployed. He had looked at the List, and, as far as he could see, there must be at least 200 in that position; besides which many of them were employed in situations which in time of war might be filled by older men from the Reserved List. Of these 855 officers, 600 were under the age of twenty-six years. At what age did they expect to get those officers of the mercantile marine who were obliged to have been for so many years on board ship in different parts of the world, and to have been for three years master of a vessel of 500 tons? He was afraid they would find it difficult to get such officers to serve in the position proposed for them, or to get them to come for one month to drill. And, in reference to the drill, he must observe that he thought it a very bad plan to have the officers living on shore while attending it. It would be much better to have them aboard ship in the company of officers of the Navy, with whom they were intended to serve in case of war. His hon. and gallant Friend who had just spoken had asked whether they would be sure of the services of those officers of the mercantile marine when their services were required? The master of a merchant vessel might just have concluded an agreement to go on a distant voyage. Would the owner think it just or honourable of him to break that engagement? They were told that he would not only come himself, but bring his crew with him. What would the owner say to that? It was said that this plan had the approval of the mercantile marine. The sentiments expressed at the recent meeting on the subject did not appear to support that assertion. The plan now promulgated was very different from that which had been originally suggested, and on the whole he had never heard a scheme proposed that gave less hope of being satisfactory to any part of the service. The creation of officers of the Naval Reserve would entail a heavy charge on the public funds, for which no equivalent would ever be obtained. The scheme was, no doubt, devised with the best intentions, but he believed it would prove an utter failure, unsatisfactory both to the Royal Navy and to the mercantile marine. He believed that the most effectual mode of fostering the navy was to provide training-ships for the young, and to free the merchant service from the trammels which had so long been imposed on it.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he had too high an opinion of officers of the mercantile marine, and knew too well their good seamanlike qualities and great integrity of character, to utter a word in disparagement of them. He must say, however, that he did not approve this Bill. He believed it would do great injustice to officers of the Royal Navy. The officers of the merchant service had strong objections to the scheme as first proposed; and his noble Friend, in conjunction with the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), had endeavoured to make things pleasant by agreeing to all they asked. It was said that there would be no difficulty in regard to the officers of the Reserve being employed under young lieutenants of the Royal Navy, because it would be easy to give them separate commands. But if that were done it would be a great injustice to those young lieutenants to whom an independent command was an object of natural ambition. These officers entered the service at an early age, underwent a great deal of severe training and irksome discipline, and received comparatively little remuneration. They ought not, therefore, to be deprived of any of their privileges. Some officers in the mercantile marine—those in the Peninsular and Oriental Company's service, for instance—received as much as £1,000 a year, which was a great deal more than officers in a similar position in the Royal Navy; and, therefore, it was a great injustice that they should be uprooted from the commands to which they looked forward. He thought it very unfortunate that his noble Friend should have introduced this Bill at so late a period of the Session. Naval questions never got due consideration, for they were always brought forward at the far end of the Session. A great many mistakes and much extravagance were the result. He suggested that the Bill should not be pressed forward this Session, and that his noble Friend and his colleagues should endeavour during the recess to devise some effectual plan for manning the navy, instead of bringing in officers who were not wanted at present.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY reminded the House that this was a purely voluntary measure, the tendency of which would be to economize the expenditure of the navy. He thought it was the duty of all those who were connected with the mercantile navy to give the Government every assistance in promoting such a scheme. It should be remembered that the force would come into use in time of war, when a number of merchant vessels would necessarily be unemployed, and he had no doubt that numbers of merchant officers would join the Reserve, animated by the same patriotic spirit which had produced the land Volunteer force.

MR. CAVE said, they did not yet know whether the scheme met with general acceptance in the merchant service. It appeared that there was a glut of commanders, and a paucity of lieutenants in the navy, and that the object was to recruit the lower rank from merchant captains. He did not think any great inducement was offered either to their ambition or cupidity. The gallant Admiral (Admiral Duncombe) had shown the superiority of the merchant service in the point of pay. The noble Lord, indeed, had compared the officers of the merchant service entering under this Bill to the Volunteers, but it must be remembered that in the Volunteer service all ranks were open. This was more like linesmen exchanging into a lower rank in the Guards, and then being debarred from future promotion. The noble Lord talked of this scheme increasing the good feeling between the navy and merchant service. If that were his object, he (Mr. Cave) thought it would be well to follow the example of Sweden, where encouragement was given to officers of the Royal Navy serving on board vessels engaged in the packet service: He should not oppose the Bill; but if there were any doubts as to the complete success of the measure he thought it would be well to postpone it for more mature consideration.

MR. HENLEY did not think the discussion had been favourable to the scheme. The fear was that out of the large number of officers in the merchant service who were qualified under this Bill the best would not be obtained. There was also a doubt whether at the end of four or five years they would find themselves in possession of that young blood which it was hoped to acquire.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for To-morrow.

GOVERNMENT OF THE NAVY BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Public Worship),

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, that this was another piece of Admiralty tinkering in the present year. This Bill had for its object to amend an Act which became law on the 17th of August last, and did not come into operation until the 1st of April, and they were now, after four months experience, asked to amend that Act. Besides, this Bill came down from the Lords, but the noble Lord, so far from accepting it as it came down, had a whole paper of Amendments to propose.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET begged the Committee to remember that the Navy had been governed by an old Act of Parliament, with scarcely any or but very small Amendments for the last two hundred years. He would ask, then, whether it ought to be a matter of surprise when they were called upon to frame a new Act for the entire government of a service like the Navy, not having a previous Act like the Mutiny Act, which, however, received Amendments almost every year to make it suitable to to the age—he would ask whether in the Navy there might not arise some matters which they would wish to see amended from time to time? As regarded the working of the Act there had been no great difficulties, but as they were no great law-years in the Navy it was thought better, instead of two Acts to have but one, and to call it by the name of the Act for the Government of the Navy. The Amendments which he had to propose were, with two exceptions, purely verbal.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 2 to 44.

Clause 45 (Punishments),

MR. HENLEY wished to know if there was any power of commuting the punishment of death in foreign states?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, this was provided for by Clause 60.

MR. HENLEY said, that Clause 60 said, "where the sentence has been commuted," but there was no power to commute given to the Commander-in-Chief.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he would introduce a clause on bringing up the Report, to meet the case suggested.

Clause agreed to, as were Clauses 46 to 55.

Clause 56 (Summoning Witnesses),

MR. HENLEY said, this clause provided that a witness who had appeared before a court-martial and had prevaricated might be brought before a Court of Law. He could not see how such a clause could be acted on. How could any Court judge of a witness who had prevaricated before another Court?

Clause agreed to.

EAST INDIA IRRIGATION AND CANAL COMPANY.

PETITION. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY presented a petition from the Cotton Supply Association, praying for the Parliamentary Encouragement of the East India Irrigation and Canal Company; and asked, Whether the Governor General of India had been informed that the settlement and execution of a contract between the Government and the East India Irrigation and Canal Company had been left entirely and without reserve in his hands, and that the Secretary of State was prepared to sanction any arrangement the Governor General might consider fair and equitable?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON: Sir Charles Wood is ready to sanction any arrangements which the Government of India, after mature deliberation, may consider fair and equitable.

ACCESSORIES AND ABETTORS BILL.

THE CRIMINAL LAW BILLS.

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Accessories and Abettors Bill be read a second time said, he should now proceed, according to his promise, to explain to their Lordships the alterations which had been made by the Commons in this and the other Bills for the Consolidation of the Criminal Law; for although these Bills had been brought up to their Lordships from the other House, they might be said to have in fact originated in their Lordships' House; because, as their Lordships were aware, after much time had been spent in deliberation as to the best mode of consolidating the criminal law, certain well-considered Bills were brought to their Lordships' House in the course of last Session, where they received a large share of attention and careful deliberation, and were sent down to the other House; but from the late period of the Session at which they arrived there it was found impossible to proceed with them last year. They, therefore, stood over the present Session, when they were in the exact form in which they left their Lordships' House, re-introduced to the House of Commons. They were there referred to a Select Committee, where they were carefully and deliberately considered, and certain alterations were made in them: so that, in point of fact, these Bills might be considered to have come back to the House in which they originated with the Amendments of the House of Commons. The most important of these Bills was that which related to Offences against the Person, and with regard to that Bill he thought the most material alterations were those which related to the punishments to be inflicted. Great mitigations had been made in the punishments attached to various offences as they stood in the Bill when it left their Lordships' House. The first section of the Bill as it left their Lordships had been struck out in the Commons, but its substance was re-introduced into the 9th Section, so that, in point of fact, no alteration was thereby made in the Bill. The first material alteration made in the Bill was in the punishment of the offence for conspiracy to murder. In Ireland conspiracy to murder had long been punishable by law as a capital offence. By the Bill as it left this House it was also declared to be felony; but in the House of Commons, by the 4th Section of the Bill now on their Lordships' table, the offence of conspiring or soliciting to commit murder, whether within or without the Queen's dominions, was made a misdemeanour, punishable with penal servitude for a period not exceeding ten nor less than three years; or by imprisonment for a term of one year, with or without hard-labour. There were also considerable alterations in the punishments awarded to attempts to commit murder by administering poison or causing grievous bodily harm, which were made punishable by penal servitude for life or imprisonment for a period of not less than two years, with or without solitary confinement. Here there was, no doubt, a great latitude allowed to the discretion of the Judges. There were other alterations in the punishments of minor consequence, but which he might state were generally on the side of mitigation. Passing from offences against the person to offences against property, he came to the Larceny Bill, the most important alterations in which related to the punishment to be inflicted after repeated conviction, the power to award the restitution of stolen property even where the jury did not convict, which was struck out by the House of Commons, and also the power for persons other than the police to apprehend persons suspected of being in possession of stolen property, which also the Commons had struck out; while a provision had been inserted that where a person was indicted for a subsequent offence he should not be arraigned on the former conviction till he had been found guilty of the subsequent offence. In the very important Bill dealing with malicious injuries to property and their punishment, that had been altered in some respects in the way of mitigation; and penal servitude for life had been reduced to penal servitude for eight years. In other respects the alterations made in the Bill were not important, and rather affected the words than the meaning. Very slight changes had been made in the Bill relating to forgery, and no material alterations in the Accessories and Abettors Bill. In the general Bill for the repeal of the antecedent law, where it was at variance with the present enactment, no alteration whatever had been made beyond bringing the repeal down to the present time. It might, therefore, be said that, with the exception of the two changes to which he had specially called attention, none of the Amendments introduced by the Commons were of an important character. He trusted their Lordships would, therefore, not object to read the Bills a second time. The noble and learned Lord then formally moved that the Bill be now read a second time.

LORD CRANWORTH expressed his gratification that these Bills were likely now to become the law of the land. Those who sat upon the Select Committee to which these Bills were referred would know that very great care and attention had been bestowed upon them, and he agreed with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that they had not undergone material alteration in the House of Commons. Since the 99-100th of the provisions they contained had been agreed to by the other House, he hoped their Lordships would deem it in accordance with practical wisdom not to raise any objection to the few Amendments that had been made. With regard to the increase of punishment for certain offences and the diminution in other cases, he trusted their Lordships would not raise much discussion. Whether conspiracy to murder should be called a felony or a misdemeanour appeared to be of little importance if there was power to award a punishment of ten years' penal servitude for the offence.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH inquired how far these Bills would extend to Scotland?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that none of the provisions of the Bills applied to Scotland. The proviso that nothing in these Acts contained should apply to Scotland except when expressly provided was inserted in order to prevent doubt.

LORD CHILMSFORD thought there was good reason to complain of these Bills being brought forward at so late a period of the Session. The first of these Bills came up to the Lords on the 18th of June, the last of them—that relating to offences against the person—on the 15th of July; yet here they were, on the 30th of July, on the second reading. Considering the punishment provided for the offence of conspiracy to murder he thought it of little consequence whether it was designated a felony or a misdemeanour, though he should prefer characterizing it as a felony. The power to apprehend persons who were suspected to be in possession of stolen property had been expunged by the Commons, and this was a serious alteration. Most of the alterations were so trifling that they might be accepted as matters of course; but there were others of a somewhat important character, to which it was impossible at that period of the Session to give due consideration. As it was the House had no alternative but to pass the Bills as they had come up to them.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, the consolidation of the law was undertaken six years ago, and the understanding was that no alteration should be made in that law, the consolidation consisting of the classification of existing offences.

LORD REDESDALE thought there was a great deal of inconvenience in taking it for granted that Bills were all right which next year they might be called upon to amend. There were some of these Bills in which there was no material alteration from the form in which they were agreed to by their Lordships last year.

but there were others which did not come within that category and he thought it better that they should be deferred to a future Session. He objected to the provision contained in the Bill which deprived the police of power to arrest persons who were in possession of goods supposed to be stolen.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that the power of the police in this respect stood exactly as it did before this Bill was introduced. All that had been done in the House of Commons was to strike out a provision introduced by their Lordships conferring a similar power upon persons not police officers. He regretted that these Bills had not come up to this House earlier in the Session, but the delay had been entirely unavoidable.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, that the alterations in the punishments carried the Bills beyond the recommendations of the Committee, who proposed that the actual law should be consolidated.

EARL GRANVILLE expressed his satisfaction at hearing the noble and learned Lord opposite say that he should have been willing to make conspiracy for murder a felony.

Motion agreed to.

Accessories and Abettors Bill; Criminal Statutes Repeal Bill; Larceny, &c. Bill; Malicious Injuries to Property Bill; Forgery Bill; Coinage Offences Bill; Offences against the Person Bill; were severally read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

CONJUGAL RIGHTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which, he said, was to introduce into the law of Scotland three distinct things. The first was to give to Scotland the advantages of certain provisions of the Matrimonial Act of 1857, which enabled a magistrate to grant an order protecting the earnings and property of a deserted wife against a profligate husband. The second was to extend to Scotland the improved process of obtaining a judicial separation, or what was usually called in law sentences of divorce a mensâ et thoro. A third provision of the Bill was to provide a remedy similar to that which was called in England a divorce a vinculo matrimonii. There was a power reserved to the Lord Advocate of intervening in cases of collusion or imperfect evidence similar to that which had been given to the Attorney General in England. Another portion of the Bill introduced into the Scotch law the principle known in England as the wife's equity by which a woman upon whom no settlement had been made at the time of her marriage could require a provision to be made for her out of property subsequently accruing to her.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 2 (Construction of Section 57 of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76).

LORD WENSLEYDALE moved the omission of the clause.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that provision was intended to establish beyond all doubt what had hitherto been the general rule.

LORD CHELMSFORD condemned the clause. It might, perhaps, work very well in large towns where the mayor was generally a person of station, but would be productive of mischief in little places where the office was often filled by a small tradesman.

LORD BELPER supported the clause.

LORD WYNFORD said, the Lord Mayor of London did not preside simply because he was Lord Mayor, but because he had been for three years an Alderman, and had had experience in the discharge of duties pertaining to the office. He hoped their Lordships would pause before they allowed the mayors generally to supersede justices created by the Crown and approved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD CRANWORTH was convinced that the course proposed by the Bill was the correct one. It appeared certain that it had been the usage for the mayors to preside. The decision of the Queen's Bench was conclusive that they did not preside by right; but they could not alter the usage without casting a slur upon the mayors throughout the kingdom, and he considered nothing more socially important than to keep up the character of those who occupied that position. If the mayor of a town thought that another person might be voted to preside he would probably not attend the meetings at all, and that would not be desirable. They would do well, in his opinion, to assent to the Bill, which only kept matters in the state in which they were.

LORD DENMAN said, he should vote with the noble and learned Lord (Lord Wensleydale).

On Question, Whether the said Clause shall stand Part of the Bill? their Lordships divided:—Contents 26; Not-Contents 25: Majority 1.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Boroughs having a separate Commission of the Peace to be deemed Towns Corporate for the Purposes of the Alehouse Licensing Act), LORD WENSLEYDALE moved the omission of this clause.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, the effect of the Amendment would be to create an unreasonable distinction between towns which had Quarter Sessions and those which had not, and he should therefore oppose it.

After a few words from Lord CHELMSFORD

On Question, Whether the said Clause shall stand Part of the Bill? their Lordships divided:—Contents 26; Not-Contents 23: Majority 3.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

DRAINAGE OF LAND BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it had only yesterday come up from the other House. It contained about 80 clauses, and it would, therefore, be necessary that their Lordships should adopt its provisions, confiding very much in the attention which had been already bestowed upon them by those interested in this subject, or that a very useful measure should be postponed until the next Session of Parliament. The measure was one which had been suggested and urged upon the Government by the country gentlemen.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, it was to be regretted that a Bill of so much importance had been brought before their Lordships at so late a period of the Session. He admitted, however, that its objects were in themselves extremely desirable, and if no serious objection should be made to the clauses there was no reason why it should not become law this Session.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH did not wish to delay the passing of the Bill, but every clause would require careful consideration in Committee.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

INDIAN MUSEUM.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any foundation for a report that the Museum lately belonging to the East India Company is to be broken up and dispersed; and why the practice of sending ten or more copies of the Printed Selections from the Records of the Indian Government to the Parliamentary Paper Office for sale has been discontinued? A rumour having got abroad that this Museum was to be broken up was the reason of his asking the question.

SIR CHARLES WOOD stated, in reply, that the collection of the Indian Museum had been removed to Fife House, which formed a convenient place for its exhibition. With respect to the second question, since 1856 only two copies of the Papers alluded to had been sent for the use of the Library of the House, but he could not state the reason of the alteration in the practice.

LIABILITIES OF SHIPOWNERS.

QUESTION.

MR. T. J. MILLER said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in the Bill promised to be brought in early next Session on the liability of Shipowners, Pilotage, and other matters, it be intended to provide for relief to the owners of British and Foreign vessels using certain public Harbours, from taxation for the maintenance of local institutions, and for payment of the debts of the municipalities where such Harbours happen to be situate?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, his hon. Friend must pardon him for declining to enter into a detail of the provisions of a Bill that was to be introduced in the next Session. He did not think that the subject embraced in the question of the hon. Gentleman strictly belonged to a Bill for amending the Merchant Shipping Act.

DELHI PRIZE MONEY. QUESTION.

MR. DEEDES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he is enabled to fix a more decided time for the settlement and distribution of the Delhi and Lucknow Prize Money than he did on the 3rd of August last year, and again at the commencement of the present Session, and what is now the cause of the delay?

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he wished to ask if there are any medals granted for Military Services in India still undistributed? The reason he asked the question was that one of his constituents in Birmingham, who had been attached to the Sappers and Miners in India, had received neither Medal nor Prize Money.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was not able to fix any period relative to the distribution of the Delhi Prize Money. The Government of India would lose no time in preparing the rolls preparatory to the payment. In answer to the question of the hon. Member for Birmingham, he was not aware whether there were any medals undistributed or not. Perhaps, however, the constituent of the hon. Gentleman had not applied to the right office.

MR. DEEDES said, if no person more competent to do so should take up this subject next Session he would call attention to the mode in which Prize Money is issued, and the delays which take place in the same, and move for an inquiry, with a view to a better system being adopted.

CASE OF MR. H. DE WOLFE CARVELL. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, What steps have been taken by the British Government to cause the liberation of Henry

Mr. T. J. Miller

de Wolfe Carvell, Esq., a British Subject, who, having proceeded to Lima as executor of the will of the late Michael Winder, Esq., also a British Subject, after the opinion of the late Attorney General had been obtained that the jurisdiction of the Court of Probate did extend to the will, has not only been unable, through the connivance of the local authorities, to recover the property of the testator, but has even been prohibited from leaving Lima, though it has been certified by proper medical authority that his detention in that climate is likely to prove fatal to him.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that this gentleman arrived at Lima in February last with the will of his father-in-law, Mr. Winder, and applied for execution of that will in regard to property in Peru. On his arrival, however, he found that a Mr. Winder, a natural son of his father-in-law, was in possession of the bonds which constituted the property in Peru, and Mr. Carvell applied to the Peruvian Government to attach such bonds as had not then been presented. In the meanwhile this Mr. Winder absconded. But then appeared Mrs. Winder, the widow of the father-in-law of Mr. Carvell, and she had gone out to dispute the will of which this gentleman had possession. Well, the Peruvian Government called upon him to remain in Peru, either himself or by authorization, to sustain his own case. He denied, however, the competency of the Peruvian Government to adjudicate in the case, and he applied to Mr. Jerningham, who addressed the Peruvian Government and requested that this gentleman might be released from the legal necessity of remaining in Peru for the purpose of carrying on his suit. That application was refused by the Peruvian Government. The case was rather a complicated one, and it had recently been submitted to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. The Government had their Report, dated the 26th of the present month, and instructions founded upon that Report would be sent in a couple of days to Mr. Jerningham. The hon. and gallant Gentleman would not expect him to state then what was the nature of that Report or of the instructions that would be sent out.

EDUCATION—ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOL INSPECTORS.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. WHALLEY rose to call attention to the Report of the Committee of Council on Education (1860 and 1861, p. 195), so far as respected the Reports of the Roman Catholic Inspectors on Roman Catholic schools receiving grants of public money, and to ask why the Reports of certain inspectors had been omitted from the Reports presented to Parliament, and moved for further papers. He observed that, out of three Roman Catholic Inspectors, the Report of only one was published. Not less a sum than £184,000 of the public money was applied for the benefit of Roman Catholic schools, under the superintendence of Roman Catholic Inspectors, and there existed no means of knowing whether the money was properly applied. There was reason to think, from all the information they had been able to obtain, that very small results in the way of education had been obtained from that outlay; but they knew that by the side of the schools there were rising up Roman Catholic churches and chapels, and consequently an apprehension was excited that the money granted ostensibly for the purpose of education was applied to the endowment of Roman Catholic chapels, nunneries, and institutions of that nature. However that might be, he contended that the accounts of the persons to whom the money was entrusted should be under the same revision as the other educational grants.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of Further Reports of Inspectors on Roman Catholic Schools receiving Grants of Public Money.”

MR. NEWDEGATE seconded the Motion, for he thought that the subject was one really deserving attention. Every other denomination supplied accounts showing that the money received for education was applied to that purpose; they stated what was the number of their scholars and the general results of their teaching; but, from the absence of the Reports alluded to, there was no security that the money was in the case of these Roman Catholic schools applied at all to the object intended. He would call attention to another point which showed extreme reticence on the part of the Committee of Council for Education. It appeared that Mr. Moseley, one of the Inspectors, had expressed the opinion that the system of the British School Society commended itself far more to the great bulk of the population of Wales than the system of the National Schools under which the Government grants were made. In consequence of that declaration the secretary of the Archidiaconal School Society of Carmarthen, thinking—he (Mr. Newdegate) concluded—that the Church should, if possible, avail itself of the terms, upon which grants were made to the British schools, addressed three questions to the Secretary of the Committee of Privy Council. He asked, first, whether the Inspectors of the British schools were instructed to report on the knowledge of the children in the Scriptures; secondly, whether the pupil-teachers in the British schools underwent an examination in the Scriptures at the end of each year; and, thirdly, whether candidates for the Queen's Colleges and certificates of merit were obliged to answer the questions in the Scriptures which were given to the candidates from the Church of England Schools. Those questions were addressed to the Committee of Privy Council with a view to produce union between Protestant Dissenters and the Church of England, and at the same time to obtain security that a Scriptural education should be given; but they received a very curt and unsatisfactory answer, the Secretary of the Privy Council Committee merely stating that, “My Lords decline to reply to your inquiries respecting the instructions issued to the Inspectors of the British schools, or to enter into any correspondence with you on the subject.” He hoped the House would express an opinion to the effect that, when respectful inquiries were addressed to them for information, the Committee of Privy Council should be more courteous and explicit in their replies. It certainly appeared to him that Parliament had a right to expect that all the information should be laid before them that could enable them to see how the money they voted for educational purposes was expended.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there could be no objection to furnish the fullest information with respect to the expenditure of the Privy Council grants for Roman Catholic schools, or to produce any Reports which might be useful for that purpose. But he would request the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) to renew his Motion in a more explicit form, giving a more precise description of the documents which he wished to call for; and if the hon. Member were to bring forward the subject again either to-morrow or on Thursday, the Vice-President of the Committee of the Privy Council for Education (Mr. Lowe) would then be in his place, and would be able to give fuller information than he could pretend to afford. The matter was, no doubt, one which deserved the attention both of that House and of the Government, and he believed the Committee of Council would profit by the observations which had been made in the course of this debate.

MR. WHALLEY could fully bear out the observations of his hon. Friend (Mr. Newdegate) as to the reticence of the Privy Council. An inquiry had been made of them respecting these very Reports of Mr. Marshall and Mr. Morrell, and they had refused to give any reply to the question asked. He had come down to the House at great personal inconvenience, being much indisposed, but he would renew the Motion on Thursday.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PESTH—MR. DUNLOP'S DESPATCHES.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH, in moving for copies of the despatches of Mr. Dunlop from Pesth, when acting lately as diplomatic agent of the Government in that locality, said he was anxious to ascertain the policy of the Government with regard to Hungary and Austria. There were several indications of what it was when they were qualifying for the benches which they now adorned when they proclaimed a policy of alliance with France and distrust of Austria, and he was desirous of knowing whether they remained of the same opinion now as then. He thought the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had shown a leaning towards Austria in despatches which he had written. However, on a subsequent occasion, in answering him (Mr. Griffith) the noble Lord said the Government would be perfectly impartial, and that he hoped Hungary would attain whatever liberties were compatible with her adhesion to the Austrian Empire. During the time over which these despatches and questions extended, a gentleman had been sent from our Embassy at Vienna to Pesth, and he was allowed to remain there until the last answer to which he had alluded was given by the noble Lord. Now, the House really had no information of a trustworthy nature as to the proceedings of the Government in the matter, and such information, he believed, could only be obtained from the despatches written from Pesth. He wished to know whether the Government leaned to liberty as against authority, or to authority as against liberty. This information the despatches would help them to obtain. There was no reason in the world why these despatches should not be published—unless, indeed, Government should think that Mr. Dunlop expressed more liberal views towards the Hungarians than they were prepared to adopt. For himself, he must say he thought the Hungarians deserved their best wishes.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of the Despatches of Mr. Dunlop from Pesth, when acting lately as Diplomatic Agent of the Government in that locality.”

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I cannot consent to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. Mr. Dunlop was attached to the Embassy at Vienna, and was stationed a certain time at Pesth in order to give the Government confidential reports as to the state of parties, as to the turn of events, as to the character and views of individuals, and a variety of matters very interesting and useful for the Government to know, but which were of that character that it would be quite wrong to make them public, inasmuch as that would entirely prevent any other person employed on such a mission from giving information that would be really useful. It is obvious that a person in a position like that of Mr. Dunlop writes without reserve a confidential despatch to his employers; he enters into many details respecting men and things which it is very useful for the Government to know, but which no man would write if he expected his despatches to be made public, and the parties with regard to whom he expressed opinions would know what those opinions were. Therefore, I am sorry I cannot agree to the production of these papers. With regard to the general observations made by the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that we are quite sensible, as he is, of the great importance of the events now passing between Austria and Hungary. We attach due importance to the maintenance of the Austrian Empire as a great Power in the centre of Europe, holding, I may say, a sort of balance between opposite and conflicting interests; and we should consider it a great misfortune to Europe if that empire were to be dissolved by any internal convulsion which could possibly be prevented. It has not, on the other hand, been deemed by the Government right or fitting, or their duty, to take any part in the dissensions now unhappily prevailing between the Austrian Government and the people of Hungary. These are matters in which really we see it would do no good to interfere. We do not feel called on even to express any opinion as to which party is in the right and which in the wrong. We confine ourselves to the expression of a fervent hope that these differences will be settled amicably, and in such a manner as shall leave Austria a great, powerful, and prosperous State in the centre of Europe. When the hon. Gentleman says he wishes to know whether we take part with liberty against authority or with authority against liberty, my answer is that we leave liberty and authority to settle their own disputes in Hungary, and that we do not presume to judge which party is in the right and which in the wrong. Whatever opinion we may entertain on the matter, we do not feel it the duty of the Government to express that opinion; nor do we think there would be any utility in expressing it or endeavouring to give it force. I, therefore, have only to say that we held with regard to the unfortunate dissensions in Hungary the same course we hold in regard to the dissensions on the other side of the Atlantic—namely, a position of entire neutrality, and I should hope that the hon. Member will not press for the production of despatches which could not be given without detriment to the public service.

MR. WHITE regretted that the noble Lord had not thought proper to produce the despatches. The noble Lord said they had no right to interfere in the disputes between the Emperor of Austria and the people of Hungary. He (Mr. White) should be very glad if that strict principle of non-intervention had been rigidly adhered to in the foreign policy of this country, but he did not understand that flexible sort of policy which could now advance as a reason for not interfering the principle of non-intervention, when it was intended to support a great power at the expense of a struggling people, and yet did not hesitate at other times to interfere when the assertion of popular rights was supposed to suit the convenience of British interests in other parts of the world. If ever there was a cause in which it was proper to interfere it was that of Hungary, because we had treaty rights with Hungary. There was frequent reference to the Treaty of Vienna of 1815.

VOL. CLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Degenerate statesmen of Whig principles too often intruded upon their notice that treaty, which had been denounced by Sir James Mackintosh and other distinguished Whig writers in years past. But it was hardly the time to talk of treaties when a people of 15,000,000, making use of the right which was distinctly laid down in their Magna Charta, of taking up arms against their Sovereign, presented the most magnificent of spectacles—that of a people united as one man—all classes combined in upholding what they believed to be their dearest rights and privileges, and resisting usurpation on the part of Austria. The idea of keeping up Austria as a first-rate Power arose from jealousy of France; but if the keeping down of a great people were thought necessary for that object, nothing could be a greater mistake or delusion. The Emperor of the French had succeeded in recognizing that the time had come when the principle of nationalities would dominate, and hence he had been enabled to maintain a constant influence, to the detriment, it might be, of the peace of Europe, but which influence the present Government were aiding and abetting by showing unmistakably their sympathy for the Austrian cause. He need not allude to the seizure of the arms at Galatz, or to the general tenor of our policy, which had been decidedly hostile to the Hungarian nation, and a most disagreeable contrast to that sympathy which we were wont to lavish upon some other nations. He could not sit down without doing homage to the great Hungarian leader, M. Deak, who, by his strict deference to a constitutional course, had earned for himself and his people the affection and respect of every person who had taken the trouble to investigate the subject.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he hoped they might confidently rely upon the observance of the principle of strict neutrality which had been laid down by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and on that ground would not press for the production of the papers referred to in his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.
House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. AYRTON said, this Bill proposed among other statutes to repeal certain revenue Acts, and he wished to direct attention to the fact that this was the first instance in which a measure for the repeal of revenue Acts had originated in the other House of Parliament.

The CHAIRMAN said, the Acts referred to had ceased to be in force.

MR. HENNESSY said, he had an Amendment to propose. The object of the Bill was stated to be the removal of useless and obsolete matter from the statute book; and as in his opinion the Act of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, passed in the year 1851, intitled the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, properly came under this designation, he proposed that it should be included among the obsolete Acts to be removed by this Bill.

Amendment proposed, at the end of page 105, to insert "14 & 15 Vict. c. 60 (Ecclesiastical Titles Act); the whole to be repealed."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Bill repealed Acts which had fallen into desuetude, or been by implication virtually repealed; but its main object was to expunge those Acts from the statute book in order to reduce its bulk. With regard to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, some maintained that it was in operation, and had been efficacious for its purpose. [Laughter.] That, no doubt, was a matter upon which opinions were not agreed; but the Motion of the hon. Member partook rather of the nature of a practical joke than a serious proposal. The Ecclesiastical Titles Act was passed so recently that it could not be included in the category of obsolete Acts which should be expunged from the statute book by this Bill.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER wished some of Her Majesty's Ministers would point out that the Ecclesiastical Titles Act had had any practical effect whatever. The Act provided that certain ecclesiastics should not call themselves the Bishops of certain dioceses; but every Roman Catholic believed that Cardinal Wiseman was Archbishop of Westminster, and Dr. Grant Bishop of Southwark, and for the simple reason that those dioceses were created by the very same authority which created the diocese of London, and all the other dioceses of the Anglican Protestant Church, except those established by the Act of Parliament in the reign of Henry VIII. Those two dioceses, together with the dioceses of York and Durham, were created by the Holy See, without any concurrence on the part of the civil power. As the Act had been and never could be enforced, it could only be considered by any person of common sense as a mere absurdity, which ought at once to be removed from the statute book, and he should, therefore, cordially support the Motion of his hon. Friend.

MR. HENNESSY said, that when M'Hale, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, was examined before a Select Committee of the House, and was asked who he was, he said, the "Archbishop of Tuam." He was then examined as the Archbishop of Tuam, and his evidence was printed by order of the House as proceeding from one holding that dignity. It was surely a practical joke, after such a proceeding, to insist on keeping this Act upon the statute book.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS thought the prohibition in the Ecclesiastical Titles Act was intended to prohibit Roman Catholic Bishops and Archbishops from taking the title of any See in the Anglican Church. There was no Protestant Archbishop of Tuam.

MR. HENNESSY said, the right hon. Baronet had made two mistakes. There was a Protestant Bishop of Tuam; and, next, the Act prohibited the assumption of titles for any place within the United Kingdom. The Act also referred to Deans, Archdeacons, and minor dignitaries of the Church.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, if the hon. Gentleman had formed any design to repeal the Ecclesiastical Titles Act it would have been better for him to have directly introduced a Bill for that repeal. If the hon. Gentleman wished to be consistent, why did he not bring in a Bill to repeal the provisions of the Roman Catholic Relief Act? The hon. Gentleman had the example of Sardinia before him, and he had also the example of Roman Catholic France; and he might derive instruction from the course of M. Dupont in the latter country, and of Count Cavour in Italy. It was vain to attempt, by a side-wind like this, to get rid of an important Act of Parliament, and he should certainly vote against its repeal.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 4; Noes 69: Majority 65.

MR. AYRTON renewed his objection to the embodiment, in a Bill sent down from the Lords, of the repeal of revenue reguations, inasmuch as the House of Commons persisted in the right of originating all measures relating to finance. He wished to know whether, if the Bill were passed, a special entry ought not to be made in the Journals of the House containing the reasons for so doing.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he believed all the statutes referred to were obsolete Acts, and that under them no duties were at present levied.

Bill passed through Committee.

House resumed.

LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Message from The Lords:

"That they do insist upon such of their Amendments to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill relating to the office, powers, and duties of the proposed Chief Justice of the Court of Bankruptcy, to which the Commons disagree, and assign the Reasons for insisting thereon.

"That they do not insist upon their Amendments to the said Bill to which the Commons disagree, and agree to the Amendments made by the Commons to the Amendments made by the Lords, and also to the Original Bill, without Amendment."

Lords Reasons to be considered To-morrow.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.—SECOND READING.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that in a Bill similar to this the Lords had moved an Amendment having reference to money, and that Amendment, therefore, could not be acceded to by this House. He now moved to bring in this Bill, and he hoped that under the circumstances the House would allow it to be read a first and second time this day.

Bill "to exempt the Volunteer Forces of Great Britain from the payment of Tolls," presented, and read 1^o.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for To-morrow, and to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS—STANDING ORDERS.

MR. DEEDES moved the following Resolution to follow Standing Order 162:—

"When in any Bill a provision is inserted authorizing any Company to subscribe towards or to guarantee or to raise any money in aid of the undertaking of another Company (which Bill is not brought in by the Company so authorized, or of which such Company is not a joint promoter), proof shall be required before the Examiner that the Company so authorized has consented to such subscription, guarantee, or raising of money, at a meeting of the proprietors of the ordinary shares in such Company, held specially for that purpose, in the same manner and subject to the same provisions as the meeting directed to be held under Standing Order 162, and that such consent was given by such proprietors, present in person or by proxy, holding at least three-fourths of the ordinary paid-up capital of the Company represented at such meeting, such proprietors being qualified to vote at the meeting in right of such capital; and that the Notices for the Bill state the sum authorized to be subscribed, or guaranteed or raised, and also state that the consent of the Company has been given as aforesaid; in any case in which such consent has been given, it shall not be necessary to submit the Bill, in respect of such provision as aforesaid, to the approval of a meeting to be held in accordance with Standing Order 162."

The hon. Member said that these Resolutions had received the unanimous approval of the Members of the Standing Orders Committee, and that Resolutions similar in principle had been adopted in the House of Lords. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no objection to the Motion.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that some time ago he put the question, whether there was any intention to propose any alterations in the Standing Orders of that House this Session? and he was assured that there was none. Under these circumstances, and at this late period of the Session, it was not acting fairly by the House to submit a proposition of this nature, which was one calculated at the present time to give rise to considerable inconvenience, and he should feel it his duty to offer every opposition to it.

MR. LOCKE must confess that he saw no necessity for entering this Resolution as a Standing Order of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE supported the Motion, which would afford a security that when railway companies approached the Legislature they were in a position to carry out the engagements which they had contracted.

MR. HENLEY also supported the Motion. It would prevent railway shareholders from being bound by arrangements entered into by directors without their sanction; and it would effect that object by requiring that the assent of the shareholders should be obtained before the introduction of a Bill, instead of being obtained during its progress.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER, as a Member of the Standing Orders' Committee, could assert that no injury would be done to any one by this new Standing Order, which would limit a certain class of speculative private Bills. It was not customary to propose any change in the Standing Orders except at the end of the Session.

Motion agreed to.

"In case any proprietor in any Company shall by himself, or any person authorised to act for him in that behalf, have dissented at any meeting called in pursuance of Standing Order 162, or the last preceding Standing Order, such proprietor shall be permitted to be heard by the Examiners of Petitions, on the compliance with such Standing Order, by himself, his agents and witnesses, on a Memorial addressed to the Examiners, or by the Committee on the proposed Bill, by himself, his counsel or agents and witnesses, on a Petition presented to the House, such Memorial or Petition having been duly deposited in the Private Bill Office."

Ordered, That the said Orders be Standing Orders of this House.

CASE OF THOMAS CARTER.

EXPLANATION.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had been asked on a previous day a question respecting the case of Thomas Carter, who had been committed to prison for three weeks in the Isle of Wight, under the Vagrant Act. He had that morning received an explanation of the case from one of the committing Magistrates. His letter was dated from a place in Ayrshire, whither his (Sir George Lewis's) letters had followed him. The writer said he had instructed the Clerk of the Petty Sessions to forward to the Home Office a Report of the evidence in the case of Carter, but he (Sir George Lewis) had not yet received that evidence. The writer added that Carter was convicted on the sworn testimony of the police, who stated that two young women, on their way home to St. Helens, were so frightened by his jumping out nearly upon them, that they were obliged to return back to obtain the assistance of their brother. Carter was found by the police drunk in a field, and unable to give any account of himself. He had been seen previously by a sergeant of police wandering about the streets of Ryde, and unable to give any account of himself. He asked the Sergeant where he could obtain a bed, and the Sergeant told him, and told him also the price he would have to pay for it. Carter, however, did not avail himself of the information, but was found subsequently in a field drunk. That was the statement made by the Magistrate, and which had been thought by him sufficient to justify the committal.

OFFICERS OF RESERVE (ROYAL NAVY) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he rose to ask, in reference to this measure, Whether the House had passed any Bill in the present Session authorizing Her Majesty to pay the Officers of the Navy Reserve, and whether the Government intend to pay them any sum, or make any allowance whatever to them?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that there was no engagement in the Bill to pay any of these Officers, and it was not intended to pay them. What he should propose was that in the Estimates of next year a certain sum should be set apart in order to give the Officers in question a small allowance, while under drill, for lodging and food. That must be voted by Parliament and, therefore, the House was not engaged to any sum by the present Bill.

MR. AYRTON said, that the noble Lord had not answered what he had asked, and was proceeding to explain the object of his question, when

MR. SPEAKER said, it was improper to enter upon a discussion of a Bill standing in the Orders of the Day before it came on in a regular order.

FREE EMIGRANTS TO AUSTRALIA. QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, By whose sanction the rule has been made at the Emigration Office, that Passages to Australia will be given to English and Scotchmen, but not to the Irish?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the question was founded on a misconception. No such rule had been laid down as was implied in the question. The Emigration Commissioners only spent the money of the Australian Government, and that Government required that the emigrants sent out should be in proportion to the population of each of the three divisions of the United Kingdom. However, owing to an insufficient supply of emigrants from England and Scotland, the number from Ireland had always been in excess of the proportion. Between 1847 and 1858, out of 257,000 emigrants sent out, 79,000 were sent from Ireland, whereas, according to the proportion, the number should only have been 61,000. The Commissioners were endeavouring to redress the proportion, and were, therefore, obliged to refuse Irish emigrants at present.

THE THAMES EMBANKMENT. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he rose to inquire, Whether the Government intend to adopt the recommendations contained in the Report of the Thames Embankment Commissioners as regards the line of Embankment proposed to be taken; and whether they intend to appoint another Commission for the purpose of carrying out the work; and, if not, to what body they propose to intrust the construction of the Embankment?

MR. COWPER said, that the Royal Commission who considered the question of the Thames Embankment had made their Report, in which they recommended a plan providing for the convenience of the public, with a due regard to private interests, in a manner much more successful than had been suggested in any previous plan; and the Government were prepared to give effect to that recommendation. The Royal Commission also recommended that there should be appointed a Special Commission to execute the work; but the Government were not prepared to adopt that recommendation. Considering that the Coal Duty was a local charge, he believed that it would be satisfactory to those who paid it that the expenditure should be in the hands of local representatives. He also thought it desirable not to establish new authorities for any object which existing authorities were competent to effect. The Metropolitan Board of Works were appointed by Statute for the execution of duties much resembling the duties required to be discharged in this case, and, therefore, in the Bill, which he should introduce next Session to give effect to the engineering scheme recommended by the Royal Commission, he should propose that the direction of the work and the expenditure of the money proceeding from the Coal Duty fund, should be entrusted to the Metropolitan Board of Works.

SALARIES, PENSIONS, &c.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, When the Returns relative to Salaries, Pensions, &c., for which an Address was moved on the 1st of March last will be presented?

MR. PEEL said, these Returns comprised every person who received £150 of the public money during the last year, and were, therefore, very voluminous. The greater number of offices had sent in their Returns, but there were one or two important offices whose Returns were still wanting, and he could not say when they would be presented to the House.

LUNACY REGULATION BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. WALPOLE made an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department not to proceed with the measure. A comprehensive Report with respect to the whole subject, and dealing particularly with the class of lunatics to whom the Bill referred, usually called Chancery lunatics, was made by a Select Committee last year. The Select Committee found that those lunatics were less visited, and, therefore, in a sort, more neglected than any other class of lunatics.

and recommended that one system of supervision and treatment should be applied to all the lunatics in the country. This object the present Bill did not effect. The 3rd Clause, giving power to the Court of Chancery, simply on affidavit, to take any lunatic's property under the value of £1,000 or £50 a year, and apply it for his benefit in a summary manner required to be carefully considered. That some such alteration was necessary he firmly believed, but he could not give his assent to the clause in the Bill, as it was drawn up too loosely and imperfectly. He also contended that the provisions of the Bill did not afford a security for the proper visitation of Chancery lunatics, and, believing that there was not one clause which did not require careful supervision he pressed on the Government the propriety of proceeding with the measure.

MR. BRISCOE, as one of the Committee, and as one who had given great attention to the subject, entirely agreed with what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. He earnestly implored the Government not to proceed at this time with a Bill of such importance, and in the absence of many hon. Gentlemen who, if present, would certainly have opposed the Bill. This Bill was brought down from the Lords on the 23rd of April, nothing was done with it in the months of May and June, it was not printed till the 4th of July, and now, on the very day that Her Majesty's Ministers were about to celebrate by the usual dinner the virtual termination of the Session, it was proposed to consider the Bill. He could not help urging on the Government to allow a short time for the consideration of the measure, and early next Session they would have an opportunity of introducing it in such a shape as might command the sanction of the House.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS trusted, notwithstanding the festivity which had been alluded to, that the House would consent to consider the clauses of the Bill. This Bill consisted of two parts, the first of which related exclusively to the simplification of procedure with respect to the poorer classes of lunatics. He had observed in that House that there were two sets of objections which were played off upon any Bill according to the convenience of the moment. If the proposal was to introduce additional elaboration of procedure, then it was immediately said that they were multiplying technicalities, that the proposal was conceived in a red-tapist spirit, and that they were overloading the simplicity of justice with restrictions and obstacles. If, on the other hand, it was proposed as in that Bill to simplify the administration of justice, and to render it cheaper and more direct, then it was said that they were taking away the protection that was due to litigants, and that the liberty of the subject was placed in danger. Now the question was whether the clauses with respect to that class of lunatics who possessed but limited means were not advantageous? This Bill was prepared with great care by the late Lord Chancellor, and was well fitted for the object it had in view. With respect to the latter part of the Bill, he proposed, by the introduction of Amendments, of which he had given notice, to leave matters nearly in the same condition as they were in at present; but there was a clause which would enable retiring pensions equal to two-thirds of their present salaries to be given to the Medical Inspectors out of the Free Fund. One of those gentlemen was past eighty, and the other was seventy-seven. With respect to the salaries of the medical officers, which were now £500 a year, it was proposed to make them £750. He trusted with that explanation the House would go into Committee.

MR. DEEDES said, that the Bill came down from the House of Lords in April, and it was not until the present moment that they were asked to go into Committee on it. He protested against matters of public interest being treated in that sort of way.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he was not aware when this Bill came down from the Lords. The hon. Gentleman knew very well that much important business, owing to the debates in Committee of Supply, had been postponed to the end of the Session. He was of opinion that a short Bill of this kind, which had come down from the Lords, might be considered up to the very end of the Session.

MR. HENLEY said, that this Bill, though a short Bill, involved some very serious principles — principles exactly contrary to those which the Select Committee recommended. They did not complain that a cheaper and more summary mode of dealing with property of a small amount was being introduced, but that this was to be done in so perfunctory a manner. Those who knew anything of lunatics, knew that lunatics sometimes got well. Chancery lunatics never did get well. He wanted to know what would be the fate of those poor people who on getting well would find their little property had been disposed of by order of the Lord Chancellor. There was no information given upon this matter, and was the House justified at this period of the Session in going into Committee? He must express his regret that the Government were determined to go on with the Bill, and considered that it was almost indecent to proceed with it at that period of the Session. They were asked to agree to the measure, not on its own merits, but because it had been well considered in "another place;" but was it evidence of its having been well considered that the Government had themselves altered it in a most material point since it came from the other House? The House of Lords came to the determination that the medical visitors should not have private practice; but the Secretary of State said they should have private practice, and gave notice of an Amendment to that effect. He submitted that they should not send back this Bill to the Lords at a period of the Session when it could get no consideration at all. It was proposed that pensions for the retiring officers should be paid out of the fee fund, which—were it not for a blessed accident—would have been swept away before the Bill was under consideration, and appropriated to another purpose.

COLONEL FRENCH said, it appeared to him that the best mode of avoiding unnecessary discussion upon that occasion was to take the sense of the House on the Motion immediately before them. He, therefore, moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

MR. BOVILL seconded the Amendment. The proposal of the Government was entirely opposed to the view of the House of Lords and of the late Lord Chancellor, who gave very great consideration to the subject. Where was the urgent necessity for this Bill? What reasons had they to suppose that the House of Lords, having deliberately passed the Bill in its present form, would agree to it in a totally different form.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day month, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL expressed his surprise at the objections that had been urged against the Bill. It was not correct to state that the Bill was totally inconsistent with the Report of the Committee. It was only proposed in one instance to depart from the recommendation of the Committee. The Committee recommended that there should be no Chancery visitors, and that the Commissioners in Lunacy should visit the Chancery as well as other lunatics; and the Government declined to adopt that recommendation. They proposed to give to the visitors hereafter appointed an increase of salary, and to give retiring allowances to the present visitors, who had discharged their duties in an exemplary manner, but were unable from their advanced age to do so any longer with the degree of efficiency that was necessary. The effect of refusing to pass the Bill would be compulsorily to retain in office gentlemen whose powers were unequal to the work which, for the benefit of the lunatics, the Government desired to have performed. If the Bill were not passed, the power of the Lord Chancellor to deal with the property of this class of lunatics would be paralyzed; and there was an urgent necessity that powers similar to those given by the Bill should be entrusted to the Court of Chancery.

MR. MALINS said, that the only question was whether they ought to proceed with a Bill of this importance at this time of the Session. He was quite in favour of certain clauses of the Bill relating to poor lunatics; but there were so many other clauses of a debateable character that he did not think it ought to be proceeded with after it had lain on the table four months unnoticed.

MR. TITE objected to the Bill, as not going far enough. He thought it of great importance that lunatics should be visited at least twice a year. The present was a very imperfect Bill, and he thought that they ought not, at the present time, to proceed with any part of it excepting that relating to the appointment of visitors.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.—THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

LORD ELCHO rose to put a Question, of which he had given notice, to the Secretary of State for War relative to the supplemental Volunteer Vote. He simply desired to elicit an explanation as to the manner in which this money was to be distributed, and what provision it was proposed to make for giving musketry instruction to Volunteer corps. The financial year of many corps commenced about this time, and in making their financial arrangements for the coming year it would be convenient to know what amount of grants would be allotted to them, either in "kind" or in money, for affording that instruction. He should not ask for any specific answer on the subject then, but should content himself with requesting that as soon as the details had been settled by the War Office, the Volunteer corps should be put in possession of the views and intentions of the Government in this matter. He desired to say that he thought the late Under Secretary for War (Mr. T. G. Baring) had rather a tendency to exaggerate the amount of assistance which was at present given by the Government to the Volunteer force, and he dreaded lest an impression might get abroad that they received more than they actually did. His hon. Friend had calculated that the Volunteers would receive, including the supplementary Vote, £190,000. He (Lord Elcho) did not think that the sum on account of Volunteers could be fairly put down at anything like that amount. In that sum was calculated £43,000 for the wear and tear of arms. But the House should bear in mind that at the time of the Crimean War the stand of arms in this country was so low that there was not 100,000 stand of arms over and above the arms in the hands of the troops employed in the different parts of this great empire. Therefore, a supply of arms was indispensably necessary, and it was rather hard to debit the Volunteers entirely with this large sum, which had been necessarily spent in putting in a stock of arms. It should also be remembered that if those arms did suffer a little more from being in use than if they were kept in the Tower, the Volunteers were obliged to repair any injury done to them at their own cost. They had also to provide an armourer, and pro tanto the Government were saved the custody of those arms. The Volunteers were also debited with £64,000 for ammunition. Now, he had calculated that about 140,000 Volunteers would draw that ammunition, and allowing ninety rounds per head, and putting that allowance at 4s., that would give £28,000 on 140,000 men, instead of £64,000. He desired on the part of the Volunteers to thank the Government for the assistance which they had already extended to them, and to express a hope that as soon as possible the scheme which they had elaborated would be made public.

Lord Elcho

MR. HUMBERSTON said, that at present Volunteer corps had not only to provide a store room for their arms, but also to pay an armourer to take charge of them, and this was a matter which he trusted would enter into the consideration of the Government. There were many battalions also which were composed of companies of Volunteers separated by long distances, who could only be brought together for the purposes of drill at the individual expense of the members, and he thought something should be done to meet that case. He trusted that any arrangement which should be made for affording assistance to Volunteers would date from the commencement of the financial year. He was sure the country would gladly pay any slight increase of expense caused by this. With respect to rifle ranges, he thought Engineer officers might be employed with advantage in laying out these ranges. He suggested that the Government should take into consideration the giving assistance to Volunteer officers and Volunteers generally to avail themselves of the instruction at Hythe.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he had much pleasure in answering the question, though he felt sure if the same question had been put to the Under Secretary when the Vote was proposed, the hon. Gentleman would have received an answer as satisfactory as those which he (Mr. Baring) had been in the habit of giving in discharging the business of his department. Of the £30,000 voted £10,000 was to be applied to the pay of adjutants, and £20,000 for drill sergeants. But this latter portion was, in fact, only for six months; therefore, it must not be considered to be merely a Vote of £20,000. If it had been taken for the whole year it would have been double that amount. The Vote had only been agreed to and reported a very short time, and there had not yet been sufficient opportunity of considering the regulations with respect to its expenditure. These were now under consideration, and would shortly be issued. When they were submitted to the public he trusted it would be found that proper discretion had been exercised in framing them.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH thought, that both Parliament and the country would gladly have given their sanction to a larger Vote, and regretted that the Government should have been less generous than the House of Commons in dealing with the Volunteer force. Musketry instruction, which was quite as important as ordinary drill, would still have to be provided out of the private funds of the Volunteers. He hoped an addition would be made to the grant next Session.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY trusted the House would permit him to take that opportunity, the last which would occur, to express his surprise and regret at the statement made by the First Commissioner of Works in the early part of the sitting with respect to the Embankment of the Thames. He had understood that the carrying out of so important an improvement as the Embankment of the Thames would be intrusted to the Metropolitan Board of Works; but it now appeared that the Chief Commissioner himself proposed to bring in a Bill on the subject, and that the Metropolitan Board were to be employed merely in the mechanical construction of the embankment. The Metropolitan Board had already resolved to examine the plans and bring forward a Bill themselves; so that if the Government persisted in their determination to take the matter into their own hands, unnecessary expense would be incurred by the preparation of two Bills. He protested, on behalf of the ratepayers of the Metropolis, against the proposal that the First Commissioner or the Government should decide what the plan ought to be, and that the Metropolitan Board should be treated like a parcel of masons. Nobody had seen the plan recommended by the Royal Commissioners, and for his own part he was entirely ignorant whether it was an economical plan or one which would be generally approved. It had received the approval of the Commissioners themselves; but, with all respect to those gentlemen, he doubted whether anybody would have selected them as the persons best qualified to prepare a plan for so important a work. Before the Government assumed the responsibility of adopting any particular plan, whether recommended by a body of Royal Commissioners or not, they should take further advice upon it. The Embankment of the Thames was to be paid for by the inhabitants of the Metropolis, and in their name he protested against the treatment which, according to the statement of the Chief Commissioner, the Metropolitan Board of Works were about to receive from the Government. Judging from the report which he had seen in The Times, the present was the first occasion, although the matter had been discussed for years, on which a proposal had been made to dispense with docks and all means of carrying on traffic on the banks of the Thames in Westminster. As four-fifths of the embankment would be in Westminster, he thought that before any plan was adopted by the Government, the opinion of his constituents should be taken upon it. For these reasons, he hoped to receive an assurance from the Government that they intended, not only to intrust the construction of the work to the Metropolitan Board, but also to impose upon that body the responsibility of bringing forward a Bill, and of deciding whether the plan recommended by the Royal Commissioners was the best which could be adopted.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, that as a constituent of the hon. Baronet and a ratepayer of the Metropolis, he protested against the proposal to intrust the Metropolitan Board of Works with the embankment of the Thames. He knew that body only in one way—they were perpetually sending him bills for rates, and, up to the present moment, he had seen none of their works, except a fine Italian palace which they had erected for themselves in Spring Gardens. The embankment of the Thames was a great national work, and as such it ought to be carried out under the responsibility of the Government.

MR. W. WILLIAMS enquired whether it was intended to construct an embankment on the Surrey side of the river? That district was exposed to frequent inundations, and it paid a larger proportion of the coal duties than any other part of the Metropolis. The embankment of the north side, moreover, would throw a larger body of water into the south side. It was, therefore, entitled to have a fair share of the money expended in the improvement of the banks of the river.

MR. BRISTOW, in reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Windsor, begged to assure him that the taxes he paid were to pay off the debts of the old Commissioners of Sewers, and he did not pay a shilling towards the erection of the edifice in Spring Gardens which he thought so grand. As to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Westminster (Sir John Shelley), he had made a mistake in saying that the Metropolitan Board of Works had taken up the plans in reference to the embankment of the Thames. At the present moment the Metropolitan Board of Works were perfectly blank on the matter. He thought, however, if the matter were left to them at all it should be left to them absolutely. If it were taken up by the Government, then perhaps the Government would pay for it. But if the inhabitants of the Metropolis were to be taxed for it, then the Metropolitan Board of Works should have the deciding upon it.

MR. COWPER had little to add to the statement which he made in the early part of the sitting. The House had agreed to place the coal duties in the hands of the Commissioners of the Treasury, in order to await the passing of a Bill authorizing the money to be expended in the embankment of the Thames. Next Session the whole matter must come under the notice of the House in the form of a Bill, and, no doubt, it would then be fully discussed. Meanwhile he begged it to be understood that he never said anything which could lead the House to suppose that the Government contemplated taking any part in the expenditure of the coal duties on the Thames embankment. The Royal Commissioners had reported that in the first instance the embankment should be executed on the north side of the river, but he was himself strongly of opinion that the work would not be complete until it included the Surrey side also. He thought, however, it would be quite enough to undertake the embankment of one side at a time.

LORD FERMOY was glad that the Chief Commissioner had to some extent retracted the statement he made in the early part of the sitting, and that the Metropolitan Board of Works were to have some control over the preparation of the plans as well as over the mere stone and mortar work. He certainly thought that, if the Metropolis was to pay for the work, their representatives should have the management of it.

MR. COWPER said, he had retracted nothing. What he stated in reply to the hon. Baronet the Member for Westminster, and what he had just repeated, was that the Government were not going to take any part in the management or execution of the Thames embankment. It was necessary, however, that the Government should take measures for passing the Bill which was to confer upon the Metropolitan Board of Works the power of making that embankment. Certain notices with respect to the purchase of property must be given in November next, unless another year was to be wasted, and, as the Government had obtained the consent of Parliament to their measure with reference to the coal duties, and had appointed a Royal Commissioner to consider the various plans which had been suggested for the embankment of the river, they would take the necessary steps for enabling Parliament to complete the subject next Session. His desire was that another year should not be wasted, but that, on the contrary, they should have an opportunity next Session of applying the coal duties to the embankment of the Thames.

MR. DEEDES regretted that the Metropolitan Board of Works were to have anything whatever to do with the Thames embankment. Hitherto they had done nothing at all, and he was afraid that, if placed in their hands, the plan recommended by the Royal Commissioners would never be carried out. It was not correct to say that the Metropolis was to pay for the embankment. The expense would be borne by the consumers of coal.

MR. AYRTON denied that the Metropolitan Board had done nothing. They were charged with correcting errors committed under the patronage of the Government for about 100 years in the drainage of the Metropolis, and when they succeeded in preparing plans for the work the Government appointed referees of their own to supersede those plans and to substitute new ones. The plans of the Board were to cost £2,300,000; those substituted by the Government would have cost £11,000,000. The Board had intelligence and firmness enough to refuse to listen to the suggestions of the Government; and what was the result? The Government of Lord Derby had the sense to intrust the work entirely to the Metropolitan Board. Such was the policy of a Conservative Government respecting the municipal institutions of the country; and the consequence was that, instead of the funds of the Metropolis being squandered in the most unintelligible and stupid manner to the extent of £11,000,000, a plan was sanctioned by the Derby Government, under which the same benefits would be conferred upon the inhabitants of the Metropolis at an expense of less than £3,000,000. The works had been going on for some time; they were of great magnitude and importance, but, being underground, the hon. Member for East Kent had not seen them, and so he jumped to the conclusion that the Metropolitan Board had done nothing. When completed they would be among the finest works of the kind in the world. With regard to the Thames embankment, a permanent Commission had been recommended, in order that some of the engineers and surveyors who had been engaged in the inquiry might continue to be employed in carrying out the work. That was the way he expected the thing would end. The right hon. Gentleman proposed a scheme which would deprive all the inhabitants of Westminster of exercising any power whatever in regard to the plans. The proceedings were to be carried on by the Chief Commissioner regardless of expense, and were to be paid for, not out of the imperial revenue, but from the local taxation. Before any steps were taken the inhabitants of the Metropolis should have the opportunity of expressing their opinions on the subject.

MR. T. J. MILLER regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had so far committed himself that this work should be carried on by the Metropolitan Board of Works. It would have been much better to take time maturely to consider the question. He much feared, if the work got into the hands of the Metropolitan Board, it would prove a never-ending job. If an independent Commission were intrusted with its execution, the expense might have some chance of being limited to the amount of the estimate.

Bill read 3^d and passed.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL. LORDS' AMENDMENTS.—REASONS CONSIDERED.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved the consideration of the Lords' Reasons for insisting on certain of their Amendments to this Bill, to which the Commons had disagreed.

The Clerk at the Table then read the Reasons as follows:—

"The Lords insist upon such Parts of their Amendments in the Preamble to Clause 1, and in Clauses 2, 3, 4, 13, 14, 18, 22, 23, 33, 37, 39, 43, 52, 55, 56, 57, 59, 60, 61, 63, 67, 68, 71, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 83, 90, 111, 112, 120, 142, 164, 169, 178, 202, 212, 213, 230, 243, and 246, and in the Schedule of repealed Parts of Statutes, as relate to the subject of a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy and Matters consequential thereon, and also to Clause (A.) added by their Lordships to the Bill, and which have been disagreed to by the Commons, for the following Reasons:—

"Because they consider the Appointment of a Chief Judge as the Head of the Court of Bankruptcy in London to be unnecessary; the original Jurisdiction which it is proposed to confer does not, in their Opinion, require a Judge of high Attainments and Authority, but would be equally well exercised by the London Commissioners, and the Creation of a new Judge to be the Judge of Appeals seems not to be called for by any Necessity, because the Appeals in Bankruptcy at present occupy the Time of the Lords Justices acting as the Court of Appeal for only a few Days in each Year, and there is no Reason to expect that the passing of the Bill will occasion such an increase in the Appeal Business as to prevent its being satisfactorily disposed of by the same Appellate Tribunal:

"Because the Proposal to confer original Jurisdiction on the Chief Judge is not at all calculated to secure Consistency in the Administration of the Bankrupt Law, inasmuch as this Jurisdiction would be confined to the Metropolitan District, and no Provision would be made by it for securing Uniformity of Decision amongst the Commissioners of the District Courts and the County Court Judges sitting in Bankruptcy, and if this Consistency in the Administration of the Bankrupt Law is to be obtained by means of 'a central and controlling Authority,' it is unnecessary to create a new Judge of Appeals for the Purpose, as the Object is already secured by the existing Court of Appeal:

"Because if it is a principal Object of the Bill gradually to supersede the Commissioners by means of the Establishment of the Chief Judge, so great a Change in the present System ought not to take place in this Manner, but should be made only by the express Authority of Parliament."

"With the preceding Exceptions, the Lords do not insist upon any of their Amendments to the said Bill to which the Commons disagreed, and agree to the Amendments made by the Commons to their Lordships' Amendments and also to the original Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved that the House do not insist in their disagreement to the Amendments made by the Lords. They were well aware, and the reasons just read made it very apparent, that the Amendments to this Bill as it originally passed the House, and on which the other House of Parliament insisted, were those which related to the appointment, duties, and salary of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. If the House were to persist in the view they had taken when the Bill was last before them, the consequence would inevitably be that the Bill would be lost; and, under those circumstances, it had become the duty of the Government to consider what course they should advise the House to pursue; and, although Her Majesty's Government retained the opinion, expressed by its Members in the discussions on the various stages of the Bill, in favour of the appointment of the Chief Judge, and that for the Reasons adopted by that House and transmitted to the other House of Parliament, and although they still considered that the provisions of the Bill were greatly impaired, and its chances of working well at the outset were very much diminished by the omission of that portion relating to the Chief Judge, still they considered that even without that part of the Bill there was an amount of good in it which was capable of working, although defectively, and which ought to induce the Government to take the Bill mutilated and shorn, as he admitted it to be, rather than not carry the measure at all. Under these circumstances the Government had come to the conclusion to advise the House—of course it was for the House to consider whether they should adopt that advice—not to insist further in their disagreement to the Amendments made by the Lords; but practically to accept the Bill as amended by the other House. He should, however, have to propose certain verbal Amendments, to which he was sure no objection would be made, which were rendered necessary for the purpose of enabling those by whom the General Orders were to be made to make them in proper time, in the absence of the Lords Justices. He now begged to move that the House do not insist in their disagreement with the Amendments made by the Lords.

MR. CRAWFORD, before taking leave for the present of a subject which he was sure would soon again occupy their attention, wished to state that, representing as he did a constituency which had taken a deep interest in the question, he was disposed to concur in the course which the Government recommended the House to pursue. He thought the people out of doors were as competent to form an opinion on this subject as noble Lords elsewhere, and when it was said in the Reasons which had been read that it was not necessary that a functionary of high legal attainments and authority should be appointed in bankruptcy, the public would view the reasons with very great suspicion. He believed the Lord Chancellor would find great practical difficulty in the working of this Bill without the Chief Judge; but the responsibility rested, not on the Lord Chancellor, but on those who had, as the Attorney General said, mutilated the Bill. If it were found that the Bill could not be fairly carried into effect without the Chief Judge, another application would, no doubt, be made to Parliament, and they would then know what course to take. He only hoped, when the matter came again to be discussed, neither senile obstinacy nor professional jealousy would be allowed to interfere.

MR. BOVILL thought the hon. Gentlemen had not exactly appreciated what was stated in the Reasons of the Lords with reference to the functionary of high legal attainments. Already Commissioners, gentlemen of great learning and legal ability, and with thirteen years' experience in that department of law, exercised jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and so satisfactorily had they hitherto administered the law that only forty-two appeals had been made from their decisions during that time. And with respect to appeals the hon. Gentleman had apparently forgotten that now the Court of Appeal consisted of the Lords Justices sitting in bankruptcy, who were acknowledged on all hands to constitute one of the best legal tribunals in the country.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That this House doth not insist upon their disagreement to the Amendments made by the Lords upon which their Lordships insist.

Consequential Amendment made in Clause 52.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

Returned from the Commons, with the Amendments made by the Lords (to which the Commons had disagreed, and on which the Lords have insisted) not insisted upon, and with consequential Amendments to the original Bill:

The said Amendments to be considered To-morrow.

GARDENS IN TOWNS PROTECTION BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD REDESDALE said, that some time ago he had called their Lordships' attention to the present state of Leicester Square Garden. Since then he had learned that "the Great Globe" was about to be removed, and there was a disposition to restore the Square to its former condition; but it appeared there were grave doubts as to what the law was on this subject, or what were the rights of the proprietors. There were powers in the Metropolis Local Management Act to preserve all open spaces; but there was some doubt whether these powers extended to the restoration of this Square to its former condition, though it had been a garden for more than a century. In order that it might not be supposed that he had lost sight of the subject, he begged now to lay on their Lordships' table a Bill for the Protection of certain Garden or Ornamental Grounds in Cities and Boroughs.

Bill,—That Gardens in Squares, &c., of Fifty Years standing may be freed from Neglect, Encroachments, &c. and vested in a Committee of Rated Inhabitants, or if such decline, in the Metropolitan Board of Works or Corporate Authority,—presented, and read 1st.

LACE FACTORIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, not only as a member of the Government, but as being closely connected with the district to which the Bill principally applied. He was the more anxious to do this because he wanted to explain the effect of certain alterations that had been made in the Bill during its progress through the other House, and by which its clauses, as agreed to between the masters and workmen, had been changed. Indeed, it had been said in the other House that the master manufacturers were opposed to this Bill, and had done all in their power to prevent its passing. He could assure the House that this allegation was wholly unfounded; and in support of that he could appeal to his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Shaftesbury) whether, when he called attention to the subject some fifteen or sixteen months ago, he (the Duke of Newcastle) did not rise in his place and state that the master manufacturers were quite willing that there should be legislation on the subject, and were also agreed on the main provisions of the Bill. It was, moreover, said that the Bill was not in conformity with the suggestions of Mr. Tremenheere, and it was added, though somewhat inconsistently with the other report, that Mr. Tremenheere allowed himself to be unduly influenced by the master manufacturers. These charges were also wholly unfounded. Mr. Tremenheere cordially approved of the present Bill, and he might again appeal to his noble Friend opposite whether Mr. Tremenheere, whose valuable services for the last twenty years were acknowledged by all parties, was capable of being unduly influenced by either one side or the other. The alterations of importance made in the Bill in its passage through the other House were two:—The first was the alteration of the age at which young persons might begin to work from eleven to thirteen. The other alteration referred to the meal hours. The plan of the masters was that the workpeople should take their meals at separate half-hours, so that the mills should not be stopped; but this was altered in the Commons to one and the same time of meals for all the workpeople, the effect of which would be that the mills would be entirely stopped. With regard to the first of these alterations it was thought that it would act prejudicially, inasmuch as the masters might refuse to employ young persons at all, and a joint committee of masters and workmen had agreed to split the difference, and fix the age at twelve. It was hoped the committee of workmen would have agreed to a plan for dividing the workpeople into two parties, and to make their half hours of meal time to dovetail into each other, so that one should come into work as the other left; but for some reason or another the workmen were unwilling to adopt this compromise, and they were placed in this position, that they must either attempt to carry this Bill against the wishes of the workmen, or drop the Bill entirely. He was now moving the second reading on a Thursday, and the prorogation would take place on Tuesday next; so that they had only two days to sit and and transact business, and any difference of opinion between the two Houses would therefore ensure the loss of the Bill. The masters had a fair ground for requesting that the Bill might be dropped, inasmuch as they believed that the clause would work injuriously both for masters and men; but within the last hour he had received a communication from a deputation who represented the masters, in which they stated that as the dropping of the Bill would be a great disappointment to the working classes, especially to the women and children, they would rather encounter all the evils they anticipated from the operation of this clause than allow it to be dropped. He trusted that, should future Amendments be required in this matter, their Lordships would bear in mind the period of the Session in which this Bill had been passed and the conduct of the masters in assenting to what they thought might prove inexpedient, and would not refuse to give a fair consideration to any representations that might be made. The noble Duke then moved that the Bill be now read the second time.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY stated, that he had been received with the greatest courtesy in Nottingham; was shown over the mills with the utmost freedom, and encountered no impediment in procuring any information which he wished to obtain. He honestly believed that the manufacturers were anxious to promote the welfare of those dependent upon them. He trusted they would be met in a corresponding spirit, and should any difficulties arise the Houses of Parliament would not object, he felt assured, to make any alterations which were felt to be necessary.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

PUBLIC OFFICES SITE BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD REDESDALE said, that although he knew the House of Commons had a great objection to vote money for the prospective purpose of acquiring land, still he thought it was very desirable that the Government should, early next Session, take power to acquire the land upon the other side of Charles Street, and also in that part of King Street which would be required for the new offices, for Charles Street was about being widened, and if this took place there would be new buildings erected, which would cost the public to purchase five times as much as the houses which were now there.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, there was great force in the observations of the noble Lord, and the Government would certainly take the matter into consideration.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

WINDSOR SUSPENDED CANONRIES BILL.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 2, (Appropriation of Profits of Eighth Canonry to Churches).

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER said, the Bill would accomplish two very desirable objects—it would increase the inadequate stipends of the Military Knights of Windsor, and augment two livings in the town of Windsor. With regard to the first object, the claim of the Knights was resisted by the Dean and Chapter, and the decision of the Master of the Rolls in favour of the Dean and Chapter was, on appeal, confirmed by their Lordships. Several thousand pounds had been expended by the Dean and Chapter in costs, and he thought some provision ought to be inserted in the Bill by which they might be reimbursed that outlay. With regard to the second object—although no one could be more glad than he was to have two poor livings increased—yet, as a trustee of the Common Fund for the augmentation of poor livings generally, he was bound to object to the recognition of a different principle by this Bill. It was contrary to the spirit of past legislation, and was opposed by all the Members of the Ecclesiastical Commission who had seats in the House of Commons.

LORD KINGSDOWN said, that although on the question of law the Dean and Chapter of Windsor were right, there never was a case of greater hardship than that of the Military Knights of Windsor.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S thought that the claims of the parishes from which the tithes were derived ought to be first considered.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, the Bill introduced no new principle. It might be a somewhat novel application of Church property, but it would be establishing a precedent which he should not be sorry to see followed in other cases, for he regretted that at the passing of the Cathedral Reform Act the interests of the inferior members of the cathedral establishments had been somewhat neglected.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Master of the Rolls and their Lordships' House had decided that no costs should be allowed, and to provide for the repayment of their costs to the Dean and Chapter would be in fact to override the judgment of two competent tribunals by force of an Act of Parliament.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY moved the omission of the Clause.

On Question, their Lordships divided:—Contents 25; Not-contents 10: Majority 15.

Clause agreed to; Bill reported without Amendments.

Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

NEWSPAPERS, &c., BILL.

LORD REDESDALE said, a noble Lord opposite (Lord Stratheden) had given notice for to-morrow of the second reading of this Bill. It was one upon which the House had already expressed an opinion and which had been rejected by their Lordships, and it was out of the question that they should be called upon to discuss it again at this late period of the Session.

LORD STRATHEDEN was not aware that the forms of that House permitted a discussion on a Bill the day before that on which it stood for a second reading, and did not join issue now with the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees on points where he entirely differed from the noble Lord in the assertions he had hazarded. As regards his intentions on the Bill, having given notice for to-morrow, he should state them at that time.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till to-morrow, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, August 1, 1861.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBERS SWORN.—For Morpeth, right hon. Sir George Grey, baronet, G.C.B.; for London, Western Wood, esquire; for Tamworth, right hon. Sir Robert Peel, baronet; for Andover, Henry Beaumont Coles, esquire.

PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Probates and Letters of Administration Act (Ireland) Amendment.

THE IRON-CASED SHIP DEFENCE. QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to ask the junior Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the iron-cased ship Defence is being built under the superintendence of Mr. Lewcock, the Admiralty Inspector, who on the 4th March last reported to the Admiralty that the steamer Hibernia was "in every respect fit to be employed for the conveyance of the Mails between Galway and the United States, in accordance with the Contract with the Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company."

MR. WHITBREAD said, it was true that the Defence was being built under the inspection of Mr. Lewcock, but the works were also looked after by his superior officer, Mr. Watts.

SUEZ CANAL.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether accounts have been received from the Consul General in Egypt giving the assurance that no Forced Labour is being employed or will be employed on the works of the Suez Canal?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, a Report had very recently been received from the Consul General, who had made a tour along the line of the intended canal, and it appeared that a considerable number of labourers were compelled to work on the canal; that they were very liberally paid by the Company, but that they had been brought to the spot without their wishes having been very much consulted.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY, in whose name a Question stood on the Paper as to when the Returns ordered by the House on the 18th of May last relative to Maynooth would be presented, said he had received a communication from the late Secretary for Ireland assigning reasons why, in consequence of some irregularity, those Returns could not be made. He, therefore, wished to express his readiness to concur in any alteration in the Motion made for them which would obviate the objection thus raised.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, it had been deemed desirable that the Returns should not be produced in accordance with the words in which the Motion for them was couched. These words assumed that certain documents were signed by the Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland, whereas there was no proof that such was the case. The publication of the Returns might, therefore, tend to implicate those Prelates in a breach of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act.

MR. WHALLEY: Will the hon. Baronet propose any words he may desire to see substituted for others in the Motion?

THE MONUMENT AND THE DUKE OF YORK'S COLUMN.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Board of Works can obtain leave to remove the Iron Cages which are at present placed upon the respective summits of the Monument and the Duke of York's Column; and, if so, whether such Cages might not be replaced by some other protection against accidents?

MR. COWPER said, that like the hon. Gentleman, he regretted the disfigurement of the Duke of York's Column by the cage which was at present at the top of it. He found that it had been placed there by the Trustees, who represented the subscribers to the work, in consequence of the suicide of an unfortunate musician who had thrown himself from the top of the column. Those Trustees were willing to substitute for the cage any other device that would be effectual for the object they had in view; but he did not at that moment see what other expedient could be adopted for that purpose.

CASE OF THOMAS CARTER.

EXPLANATION.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he had yesterday read to the House a letter from the Magistrate by whom Thomas Carter had been committed to prison, explaining the grounds of that committal. He had since received a copy of the evidence on which the conviction was founded, and it seemed to him that the depositions of the witnesses were so meagre that the imprisonment which Carter had undergone was sufficient to meet the justice of the case, and he had, therefore, given directions to have him discharged.

SUPPLY OF PROVISIONS TO THE NAVY.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the attention of the Board has been directed to the fact that considerable inconvenience may arise if, in the present condition of the United States, we are to continue to depend on that country for our supply of beef for the use of the navy?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: We now cure our own beef, and we have no contract on the subject with any foreign country.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

MR. WHALLEY moved that the Order for the Returns relative to Maynooth College should be discharged. He intended, he said, to renew it in another form.

LORD FERMOY said, that before the Question was put, he wished to know what were the intentions of the Government with respect to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act. The Chief Secretary had intimated on a former occasion that there was an intention on the part of the Irish Government to carry out that Act. The people of Ireland, and of England also, would like to have some information upon that point.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the Question before the House was simply one for the discharge of an unopposed Motion. It was, therefore, hardly matter for debate.

MR. HENNESSY explained, that, although the Motion was unopposed by the Government, he had intimated to the hon. Member for Peterborough that he intended to oppose it. He submitted that before the Order was discharged it should be read to the House.

MR. SPEAKER understood that the hon. Member for Peterborough wished to withdraw his Motion for the Returns with a view of proposing it in an amended form. When the Government had no objection to a Motion for Returns it was usual to regard it as unopposed.

MR. WHALLEY said, that, in order to avoid discussion at the present moment, he was desirous to withdraw his Motion, with the view of postponing it till next Session.

MR. CARDWELL remarked, that it was necessary to discharge the Order for the Returns on account of an irregularity. The Order implied that an offence had been committed which that House did not know, and which the parties by whom the Returns were to be made were bound not to admit as a fact until it was proved to be so. It was necessary, therefore, that the Motion should be discharged, in order that the information might be given in a manner conformable to the rules and regulations of the House.

LORD FERMOY gave notice that he should at a future sitting ask what were the intentions of the Government relative to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was prepared to answer that question at once. It was not the intention of the Government to propose any alteration in the law, and if cases occurred they would be dealt with as circumstances might seem to warrant.

MR. WHALLEY remarked, that the hon. Member for the King's County might, perhaps, remove the difficulty about the Returns by admitting on the part of the Roman Catholic prelates that they had appended their territorial titles to their names.

Order discharged.

(SCOTLAND) (No. 2) BILL.
LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

THE LORD ADVOCATE explained, that the reason why the Bill had been introduced so late in the Session was in order to enable the General Assembly to consider the measure. When the schoolmasters applied to him to bring the subject forward, he stated that having twice attempted to carry a Bill without success he would not again take up the question unless he had reason to expect that the Bill would be favourably received, not only in that House but elsewhere. It was not until after the Easter recess that he had reason to think that that expectation would be fulfilled. He had only to say, that it was with great gratification he found that at least they were about to settle this controversy which had been pending for twenty years. He could not but congratulate the House that at length justice was about to be done to a most meritorious class of persons.

MR. ADAM desired to enter his protest against that Amendment made by the Lords which substituted three Professors of Divinity instead of two, and thus gave to the Established Church equal power with the laity in the examination of schoolmasters. The result would be that none but members of the Established Church would be admitted. He trusted that next Session some improvement in that point would be made.

MR. HOPE trusted that all parties in Scotland would work harmoniously together to carry the measure into effect.

OFFICERS OF RESERVE (ROYAL NAVY)
BILL.—THIRD READING.

Order for third Reading read.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET moved the Order of the Day for the third reading of this Bill.

MR. LINDSAY said, that not having been present when this Bill was discussed, he wished to say a few words. He thought it a valuable measure, and one which on various grounds ought to receive the sanction of the House; but much must, of course, depend on the regulations by which it would be carried into effect. As chairman of the meeting of officers of the mercantile marine held some weeks ago at the London Tavern, he had been deputed to wait on the Duke of Somerset, in order to acquaint his Grace with the resolutions to which they had come. It was but justice to say that the Duke of Somerset and the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty had gone as far as practicable in meeting the objections which the officers of the merchant service entertained to the scheme. He, therefore, trusted the officers of the merchant service would have no hesitation in coming forward and entering themselves, as patriotic men, in this Reserve; and if they did so there would, he was sure, be no difficulty about the Reserve of 30,000 men recommended to be raised. At the same time, he thought his noble Friend had not been sufficiently explicit on one subject—he meant the difficult and delicate point of rank. Within the last ten years, since the passing of the Mercantile Marine Act, the officers of the mercantile service had greatly improved in character. They had to pass an examination in seamanship and navigation quite as strict as the officers of the Royal Navy had to undergo; and it would not be agreeable to them to serve under junior officers of the navy, who in comparison with themselves might be mere boys. That difficulty might perhaps be met in this way:—The officers of Reserve could only be called out on emergencies. On such occasions there would, no doubt, be a great number of small gun and despatch boats employed, and the Admiralty might place those officers as lieutenants in command of them. These officers were willing—nay, anxious, to enter the Reserve force even at a considerable pecuniary sacrifice; but they desired that their position in the Reserve should not be inferior to that which they now occupied. He hoped the noble Lord would say a few words on this occasion to encourage these officers to join the Reserve. He could testify to the best feeling existing between the officers of the two services, and he hoped immediately the regulations were issued it would be found the full complement of officers had entered, to be followed by the full number of seamen. Having said so much on this Bill, he might be allowed to say a few words in regard to the naval armament. At the commencement of the Session he had made a statement on the authority of the French Minister of Marine in regard to the armaments in that country, and every means had been placed at his disposal to enable him to ascertain whether the figures were accurate. He had himself received an invitation to visit the dockyards of France, and, although he was unable to avail himself of that invitation, a competent gentleman had been despatched under his direction to make a thorough inspection of the French dockyards. The result of that gentleman's observations entirely confirmed the accuracy of the figures which he had himself submitted to the House on the subject. During the Easter recess his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish) and another hon. Member also visited the French dockyards, and orders were granted by the French Minister of Marine to facilitate their inspection of everything to be found there. They made an inspection accordingly; and they, likewise, confirmed everything which he had said to the House in regard to the then naval armaments of France. He mentioned this because some remarks that he had made the other night had evidently been misunderstood across the Channel. It has been stated, however, that of late a great movement had been made in the number of iron-cased ships about to be built, or building by France. It was difficult to put faith in the statements made on this point the other night by the noble Lord at the head of the Government and by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty; but if those statements were correct, then, considering the extent of our property afloat and on shore, and considering also the vast extent of our seaboard both at home and in our colonies, there was no other course left to England but to go on building those iron ships for which the Votes had been taken. The necessities of our position required that if France had twenty of those ships this country must, he was sorry to say, have thirty. But while he said that he nevertheless could not doubt the friendly intentions of France towards England; because the Emperor knew it to be his own interest to maintain amicable relations with us. From the conversations which he had had with the Ministers of France, as well as with the Emperor himself, he believed the French Government were willing to come to some understanding with this country as to the relative strength of the armaments to be kept up by the two Powers. On the part of the people of France he thought a similar desire existed, and he, therefore, earnestly hoped that Her Majesty's Government would during the approaching recess use their best endeavours to carry out such an understanding.

MR. STANILAND appealed to the Government, before the Session closed, to inform the House and the country whether there was the slightest chance of any such arrangement being concluded between the two Governments as that to which the hon.

Member for Sunderland had referred. If it were possible—even though it might be most improbable—that such an arrangement could be come to, it was due to the people of England, on whom the enormous cost of these armaments would fall, that the attempt should be made. France and England seemed, by a process of financial exhaustion, to be trying to discover which could expend most money in increasing its armaments. There was nothing to justify the course which France was pursuing in this respect. It was only due to the taxpayers of this country, who were ready to bear every needful burden for the national defence, that they should learn from Her Majesty's Government whether any attempt had already been or would still be made with a view to bring about some limitation of the ruinous rivalry now going on between the two countries.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET only wished to say, in answer to the remarks of the hon. Member for Sunderland as to the comparative armaments of France and England, that the statements which his noble Friend and himself made the other day had reference to a totally different period from that to which the hon. Member had alluded when he gave the House the information that he had obtained regarding the French dockyards. The hon. Member for Sunderland, as he understood him, had caused certain parties to go and inspect the French dockyards. Now, the Government were perfectly aware that early during the present year there was no considerable progress making in those ten additional iron-cased ships. But since that date an order had been given to all the French dockyards to proceed with those ships; and the statement made by his noble Friend had reference to that circumstance. In regard to the matter really before the House—namely, the third reading of the Officers of the Naval Reserve Bill, he must say he did not think his hon. Friend had done justice to his remarks concerning those officers the other evening. He had distinctly stated that he was quite sure the Admiralty would consult the feelings of the senior officers and old captains of the merchant service who entered the Naval Reserve, and that if they should be called upon in time of war it would be the duty of the Admiralty, as far as possible, to avoid putting them in a situation that would be derogatory to their professional standing or character. He was sure that no Board of Admiralty would ever think of offering any affront to those officers. On the contrary, the desire would be to place them in an honourable position if ever they should be called upon for active service. It was impossible for him now to make a prospective arrangement as to what should take place in the unfortunate event of a war. He could only say that the Admiralty accepted the services of these gentlemen with the highest possible gratification. He hoped and believed that they would come forward in great numbers to serve their country as the rest of their countrymen had done, and he would earnestly beseech them, as he would beseech his own brother officers, to cast aside all the ancient antagonism and jealousy which had, unhappily, prevailed. He trusted that there would be a general desire for mutual conciliation on the part of the navy and the merchant service, and he was confident that these officers of the Reserve would be cordially welcomed into the service.

MR. WHITE wished to draw a moral from the remarks of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty. The noble Lord said that when the hon. Member for Sunderland sent a special agent to France to ascertain the amount of naval preparations going on there, the progress then described as being made in the French dockyards was correct; but that since then, or three months afterwards, a vast augmentation in those preparations had taken place. Would it not be reasonable to infer that the magnitude of our preparations had provoked the increased activity of France? What was the use of the boasted friendship and alliance between the two countries if things were to go on as at present? When was the rivalry to cease, and could not some understanding be come to between the two countries to put an end to a state of things which sooner or later must lead to a collision?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My hon. Friend has drawn a conclusion which is not warranted by the facts nor by the statement of my noble Friend. He infers that because the active execution of these new ships had not begun when the inquiries of the hon. Member for Sunderland were made, therefore, the subsequent commencement of these ships was owing to our preparations. Now, in point of fact, we had made no preparations, because the orders which have been issued for casing some wooden ships, and for commencing the construction of some iron vessels, are very recent and subsequent to what the French Government has done, and are founded upon what that Government has done. But the real history of the case is this, as I said the other evening:—In December last the French Government took a resolution to construct ten iron ships in addition to the six which were known to us before. They had doubts as to the proper mode of construction, and those doubts were to be solved by experiments which were to be made by the Gloire, which was afloat. They remained from that time until May in suspense, and it was not until May that, having settled certain doubtful points which were not settled before, and which were only decided by the cruise of the Gloire, orders were given actively to proceed with these ten armed ships. The keels were then laid down, and proceedings commenced. And, therefore, as my noble Friend said, the investigation made by the hon. Member for Sunderland took place at a time when the order had been determined upon, but not actually given to the dockyards, and anybody going to the dockyards then would see nothing, because there was nothing to see. The statements made by my noble Friend and myself at a later period referred to the actual commencement of these ships. Now, as to the other question—one of great importance—whether the British Government could not enter into communication with any foreign Government—for it must not be confined to France—but with any foreign Government, with a view to impose a limit upon the respective naval forces of the two countries, that is a more important question, of great difficulty, and open to much criticism. I think that, although at the first blush it appears to be a practicable thing, I think that any British Government would long pause and hesitate before it entered into any agreement with foreign countries limiting the amount of force, naval or military, which this country ought to maintain. We should judge of that amount according to the circumstances of the moment. Any agreement must be with several foreign Powers; because it is not France alone that is a naval Power. There are Russia, the United States, Spain—which is growing in importance—and other States which have navies, and, therefore, any limitation of our own force must be made with a view not only to the naval power of France, but to any possible combination of other Powers. Such an arrangement would, I think, lead to interminable doubts and disputes. We must have officers watching them, and they must have officers watching us; there would be doubts and suspicions of bad faith, and, instead of laying the foundations of peace, we should, I fear, be sowing the seeds of future interminable dissensions.

On Motion for the Adjournment of the House,

EDUCATION—ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), who was not present at that moment in the House, had given notice to call attention to the Report of the Committee of Council on Education (1860 and 1861, p. 195), so far as respects the Reports of the Roman Catholic Inspectors on Roman Catholic schools, receiving grants of public money, and to ask why the Reports of certain Inspectors—namely, Mr. Morrell and Mr. Marshall—have been omitted from the Reports presented to Parliament, and to move for the production of such Reports. Before alluding to that subject he wished to ask whether some questions had not been addressed to the Committee of Council on Education respecting the system of grants to the British schools in Wales, and whether anything had been done, the effect of which was to place these schools in a better position for receiving assistance from the Education Board than the schools of the National Society, and whether due securities were taken for the communication of religious instruction in these schools? He wished to call the attention of the House to some of the statements in Report of the one—the only Inspectors’—which had been laid before them; statements referring to the imperfect manner in which the accounts were kept in the Roman Catholic schools under his inspection. The Inspector stated that in several of the Roman Catholic schools, for instance, those of Hammersmith and St Leonard’s-on-Sea, both of which schools were connected with convents, there were really no proper accounts whatever kept; and that there was nothing to show that the grants voted for the purposes of those schools had not been devoted to quite different objects. He (Mr. Newdegate) would not enter into the details of this Report, but would merely confine himself to its general effect. In reference to Hammersmith, the Inspector stated that the accounts presented to him there were made up in accordance with no known system of account, and with respect to St. Leonard's-on-Sea that the expenses for the maintenance of the schools were mixed up with expenses of various other kinds, so that it was impossible for him to give an assurance to the Committee of Education that those accounts fairly represented the expenditure of the public money upon education. Those facts he (Mr. Newdegate) thought quite sufficient to make the House desirous of obtaining the Reports of the other Inspectors of Roman Catholic schools; and to create considerable uneasiness as to the mode in which the public money given for a special purpose had been appropriated. He begged pardon of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), whom he now saw in the House, for having anticipated his question of which he had given notice. He, like the hon. Member, was anxious that the House should have some clear account of the expenditure of this money, and he, therefore, wished to know why the Reports of the other two Inspectors had not been laid before them?

MR. WHALLEY then rose, pursuant to notice, to call attention to the Report of the Committee of Council on Education for 1860 and 1861, so far as the same had reference to the reports of the Roman Catholic inspectors on Roman Catholic schools receiving grants of public money. He also desired to ascertain why the reports of Mr. Morrell and Mr. Marshall, Inspectors, had been omitted from the reports presented to Parliament, and to move for the production of such reports?

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was not in order in introducing this subject upon the Motion for the adjournment of the House, after having allowed the Motion to which he referred to be passed over without expressing an opinion upon it.

MR. WHALLEY appealed to the noble Lord at the head of the Government to permit him to proceed. He had merely gone to the library for a few moments, and during his absence the Motion for adjournment was made. It was understood that the return would be granted, and was only delayed in consequence of the absence of the Vice-President of the Committee of Council. It was really a matter of very great importance, and he could speak on the Motion for adjournment. In the Report there was no satisfactory account of the application of the money. Instead of being applied to the purposes of education, it was palpably and plainly applied to the erection of chapels and churches. ("Order, order.")

MR. SPEAKER again interposed.

MR. WHALLEY: Really I am very hardly dealt with.

MR. NEWDEGATE hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Education would favour him with an answer to his question.

MR. LOWE said, that the Questions referred to the management of Dissenting schools, and were abstract questions, intended to give rise to controversy. As the Education Committee had a great deal of business to attend to, which they could hardly overtake, they declined to be drawn into an abstract discussion by a member of one sect as to the mode in which they dealt with another sect. If they did this the Privy Council Education Committee would be the battle-field of rival sects, and much ill-will would be stirred up. His hon. Friend (Mr. Whalley) a short time ago complained that a report by Mr. Morrell, one of the Inspectors, contained some improper expressions. He concurred in this opinion, and told his hon. Friend the matter should not occur again. He was not altogether satisfied with Mr. Morrell's report this year, and he thought it better not to print it all at the public expense. Last year his hon. Friend was angry with him because he had printed Mr. Morrell's report while this year he was angry with him for not printing it. It was desirable to keep some moderation in these reports. Every Inspector of schools made two reports, one a tabulated report of the number and state of the schools in his district, and the other a general report, which ought to be confined to the state of his schools and practical suggestions for their amendment. When expressions were used which he did not approve, or when irrelevant matter was introduced, it was his duty to send the reports back to the Inspectors. He could not omit passages, or make alterations, without being charged with garbling, so that when the reports were returned to him unaltered, or still containing objectionable matter, he made it a rule to suppress them altogether. If, however, hon. Members move for the production of Returns which he had thought it undesirable to print with the others, it would be offering a premium for objectionable reports.

MR. HENNESSY quite approved of the course pursued by the Privy Council in suppressing the irrelevant reports. Indeed, he would go so far as to say that the tabulated reports contained the only information which was useful or interesting to the public, and that the general reports were made only for the information of the Department, and ought not to be printed at the public expense. None of the Inspectors were Roman Catholics.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter

REVISION OF THE STATUTES BILL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in presenting a Bill for the Revision of the Statutes from the Commencement to the End of the Reign of Edward the Third, said, their Lordships were aware that some time antecedent to the year 1859 a Commission was issued for the purpose of consolidating the statute law. He could not say that the proceedings of that Commission had met with general approbation, or that they had done much to accomplish their object.
The Commission was not renewed in 1859,

Mr. Lowe

House of Commons, and when the present Government came into office it was necessary to consider what steps should be taken in the circumstances. It appeared to the late Lord Chancellor and to himself that the proper course was to ascertain what the statute law really consisted of, before they proceeded to the introduction of any consolidating measure. They determined, therefore, to appoint certain gentlemen of great ability and industry to proceed with a revision of the statute law.
These gentlemen had already proceeded in the task with a revision of the statute book from the beginning of the reign of George III. down to the present time, and a Bill, embodying the results of that revision was passed in their Lordships' House early in the present Session; and,
having also passed through the other House, was now again before their Lordships.
The statutes thus swept out of the statute book had become unnecessary from various causes. Many of them had been expressly repealed. Others had fallen into desue-tude from the circumstance that there was no longer any subject matter on which they could operate. There was another class of statutes which were repealed in general terms—that was to say, subsequent enactments had declared that all preceding enactments inconsistent with the provisions there enacted were repealed; there were others which were in effect repealed because, although there were no words in subsequent enactments which specially or generally repealed them, yet they—those subsequent statutes—enacted what was inconsistent with and repugnant to the older statutes. Other statutes were not repealed, but superseded by subsequent Acts introducing new modes of dealing with the matters. Other statutes referred to customs that had since passed away, and were, consequently, inoperative. All those classes of Bills were as completely superseded as if they had been actually repealed; but they could not be omitted from the statute book without an Act of Parliament, and that authority as to one portion of the statute book was given in the Bill which,
as he said, passed their Lordships' House early in the Session. He wished, however, that the present Session should not pass without proceeding one step farther, and accordingly he had prepared a Bill, which he would now lay on their Lord-
turely considered during the recess—a

Bill for revising the statutes from the earliest times to the end of the reign of Edward III. The Bill proceeded on the same principle of revision as that he had already described with regard to the statutes of George III. and downwards, and the effect of this measure, if it were sanctioned by Parliament, would be to reduce the present bulky volume containing these earlier statutes to one-tenth of its present size, and he anticipated, as this work went on, to reduce the volumes containing the statutes in a still greater degree.

Bill presented, and read 1^a.

MODENA.

LORD WODEHOUSE laid before the House "Despatches relating to the Affairs of the Duchy of Modena, from Her Majesty's Ministers accredited to the Courts of Central Italy, during the years 1855, 1856, 1857, and 1858, (pursuant to the Address of the 22nd July last.)

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, who had given notice of a Motion for an Address to Her Majesty for Copies or Extracts of any Letters from Her Majesty's Consul Mr. Walton, as to the State of the Duchy of Massa-Carrara during the years 1855, 1856, 1857 and 1858, said he wished to explain to their Lordships the reason why it was not his intention to persevere with his Motion. When he asked for the production of his own Reports upon the events which passed in Modena during the four years to which the charges made against the ruler of that Duchy particularly referred, he did so because upon every occasion on which he had made a periodical visitation in Modena he had received from the Government authorities every information and every facility for ascertaining the true state of the Duchy. Therefore, if some of those accusations which had been made against the Duke of Modena were well founded he should himself have been culpable for not having noticed the facts in his Reports to Her Majesty's Government. His noble Friend had just presented those Reports; and he wished to state that, when he asked for further Reports from the Consul in the Duchy of Massa-Carrara, he did so because that particular Duchy had been the scene of crimes of unusual violence, owing to the action of secret societies and other political causes. He had, therefore, been anxious to have the Reports of that intelligent and impartial gentleman who had long represented Her Majesty's Government as Consul in that quarter. His noble Friend had, however, intimated that although there was no objection on public grounds to the production of these papers, yet that in the present state of that country their publication might, perhaps, lead to serious inconvenience, owing to the peculiar situation of the writer. Under all the circumstances it occurred to himself, also, that it would be more prudent not to press for the production of these papers, at least at present. After the first accusation which had been made against the Duke of Modena relating to the proceedings before the Commission of 1857, an appeal had been made to him (the Marquess of Normanby) by a gentleman connected with the whole of these proceedings, namely, the Judge Advocate, who had acted with singular humanity in the discharge of a painful duty, and that appeal made it desirable that the imputations which had been made in this matter should be removed by the testimony of the British agent, who was in that country at the time. He understood, however, that the friends and advisers of the Duke of Modena who had hitherto furnished him with the materials for defending that ruler had determined that the whole of the proofs should be made known to the British Government by the publication of the official documents. He was quite sure that the facts of the case would in that manner meet the public eye in a much more accessible form than through that strange and somewhat confused compilation which he had seen in the hands of some noble Lords opposite, and which he knew to have been the foundation of the charges that had been made in "another place." He was quite certain that the production of these official documents would show that Count Cavour had been a conspirator for the last twelve years, and would also disclose the means by which his conspiracy had been carried on. He would now merely conclude by withdrawing his Motion.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that Mr. Walton was not in the position of a paid Consul, but was a very intelligent and respectable merchant residing at Carrara; and it had been thought by his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary that it would not be expedient to publish his confidential reports. He had communicated that fact to the noble Marquess, who he was glad to find, had come to the conclusion to withdraw his Motion.

Motion withdrawn.

INDIA.—PETITIONS.

LORD MONTEAGLE presented several petitions from Natives of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, Bombay, Madras, and Tanjore, respecting the operation of the income tax in India, and praying for the admission of Natives to the offices of Zillah Judge and Assistant Judge. The noble Lord was understood to urge upon the Government the necessity of the speedy production of the official documents relating to the finances of India, and said he wished to know whether the Government would lay on the table of the House the speech which Mr. Laing lately made in the Legislative Council of India, explanatory of his views respecting the finances of India. The similar statement made by the late Mr. Wilson, the predecessor to Mr. Laing, had been submitted to Parliament, and to render the present condition of India intelligible it was necessary that Mr. Laing's speech should be produced likewise. He also wished to know whether the reports of the moral and material progress of India would be laid upon the table according to the enactments of the Bill of 1853?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON replied, that most of the objects which were sought by the petitioners had already, to a considerable extent, been anticipated by legislation suggested by Her Majesty's Government in the course of the present year. The noble Lord had asked two questions. First, he had asked for a copy of the speech of Mr. Laing to the Legislative Council of India. It was true that a similar speech of Mr. Wilson's had been laid before Parliament; but that was done because it was an essential part of the question which had arisen with regard to the conduct of Sir Charles Trevelyan. But he would submit whether it was a desirable practice to lay on the table of the Houses of Parliament speeches made in the Legislative Council of India. The whole of the financial information which the noble Lord sought for would be laid before the House in the shape of financial dispatches. As to the other question, whether the statements with regard to the moral and material progress of India would be laid on the table he might say that the papers containing the information had been presented within the time prescribed, and they had already been printed and circulated, and he held a copy in his hand. They contained a detailed report of all the acts which had been passed by the Indian Legislature during the year.

Lord Wodehouse

LORD MONTEAGLE said, the book did not contain all the documents he wanted; and if the papers had been presented within the time required by the law this was of little avail if an undue delay occurred in the printing. In this case the printing was not finished till August.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.
COMMONS' CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved that the Commons' Consequential Amendments in this Bill be agreed to. As the Bill originally stood it was provided that the Lord Chancellor should, with the consent of the Chief Judge, make orders touching the forms of procedure of the Court; but of course the appointment of Chief Judge having been struck out of the Bill that provision fell to the ground. Their Lordships had suggested, that for the Chief Judge should be substituted the Lords Justices; but a further alteration had become necessary in consequence of the period at which the Bill came into operation, and for the Lord Justices the Commons had inserted "two of the Commissioners." This Bill had been to him a matter of deep anxiety, and it would now be his duty to endeavour so to frame and regulate the orders of the Court that the fullest scope and operation would be given to the measure, and that it might work as beneficially as possible.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that the alterations and Amendments made in the Bill were only such as were absolutely necessary.

SECOND READING. ORDER DISCHARGED.

LORD STRATHEDEN said, it would ill-become him, after having on the 29th of July endeavoured to insist on the necessity and policy of the Resolution to arrest Bills before that period, to urge upon the House at so late a day as this a controverted measure. It never once occurred to him to do so. He gave notice of the second reading that their Lordships might be made publicly aware of the fact that the other House of Parliament, without any opposition, had sent up a Bill to repeal the Act of 1819, which first imposed securities on publishers and printers; so that if a Bill of this kind next year came before them at an early time in the Session, it might have whatever weight—he did not wish to over-estimate it—this previous sanction was entitled to confer upon it. And here he should sit down had it not been for a statement which fell last night from the noble Lord, the Chairman of Committees, that the judgment of the House had last year been given on the Bill. Such a statement would entirely mislead them. Last year a Bill on the subject of the press was introduced, but, so far from being identical with the Bill he now had charge of, it related in a great measure to an Act of 1799, which this Bill does not even touch. Unless the present Bill had been framed to meet various objections which last year were started, he (Lord Stratheden) would not have been connected with it. The division last year, besides, was never taken on the merits of the Bill which the House rejected. The Bill was brought forward with no explanatory argument, because no notice had been given to oppose it. It was not defended in reply, because those who viewed it with suspicion were still prepared to grant the second reading; until on a sudden after-thought, when he (Lord Stratheden) had set down, a noble and learned Lord resolved upon dividing. Having thus explained the object of the notice, he, with their permission, would withdraw it.

LORD CHELMSFORD complained of the way in which their Lordships were treated with respect to this measure. Although a similar Bill to this had been introduced into the other House of Parliament in every Session since 1859, it had never been discussed by the other House. The Bill of 1860 proposed to repeal three Acts of Parliament, and came up to that House in the latter part of July. He (Lord Chelmsford) having stated his objections to some of its provisions, moved the rejection of the measure. The result was the defeat of the Bill by a majority of 36 to 10, and amongst this majority were several of the Cabinet Ministers. So quietly had the Bill of the present Session been introduced into the other House and passed through all its stages, that he should not have known of its presence upon their Lordships' table had he not been informed of the fact by an anonymous correspondent, who signed himself "Amicus," and who pointed his attention to some of its provisions. Under these circumstances he thought it rather hard that the House of Commons, knowing that a similar measure had been decisively rejected by their Lordships last year, should have now sent up to them this Bill at this period of the Session

EARL GRANVILLE thought it rather hard upon the noble Lord (Lord Stratheden) that the noble and learned Lord should make an attack upon a Bill which, as far as the noble Lord was concerned, was dead and gone.

LORD STRATHEDEN assured his noble Friend, the President of the Council, that he would not imitate the example of the noble and learned Lord, who might, however, be excused as he had come up from the country, and was, no doubt, extremely disappointed at the withdrawal of the Bill he had intended to attack. If next year it was his (Lord Stratheden's) fortune to address their Lordships on the subject, he should then endeavour to reply to as many of the noble and learned Lord's remarks as he thought at all likely to influence the House.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read and discharged; and Bill to be read 2^a on this Day Month.

WILLS AND DOMICILE OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD, &c., BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, observed that the subject of domicile was a very difficult one. If a man died abroad and he retained his English domicile his property would be liable to legacy duty; whereas if he was domiciled in a foreign country it would not. The law of domicile had also a great deal to do with questions of marriage. There was no difficulty as to the rule of domicile; but there was often the very greatest difficulty in its application, for the moment a question arose as to a man's domicile it became necessary to inquire into everything that he had done and everything that he had said, in order to discover whether he had ever formed the intention of abandoning his country. The infliction upon parties litigant of the present law of evidence on the subject was very grievous; and for that it was the object of this Bill (which had already passed the House of Commons) to furnish a remedy. It provided, therefore, that no British subject resident abroad should be held to have changed his domicile unless he had declared his intention of doing so by an unmistakeable and public act. There was a similar provision with regard to foreigners resident in England. That

Dr. Corrigan—all gentlemen of high proportion of the Bill could not be carried into effect without the co-operation of the foreign Governments; but the success which had followed the International Copyright Act led him to hope that there would be no difficulty on that score. The Bill also contained a provision with regard to persons dying in a foreign country without friends. In such cases it gave power to the Consul of the nation to which he belonged to take out letters of administration and to act as his representative.

Bill read 2^a; Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next.

APPROPRIATION OF SEATS (SUDBURY AND ST. ALBANS) BILL.

Question put, "Whether this Bill, with the Amendments, shall pass?"

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Bill passed.

PROTEST.

"DISSENTIENT:—

"1. Because the Third Reading took place out of the Order in which the Bill stood upon the Notice Paper, at a Time when Public Business was not in any way expected, and not upon the Motion of the Minister in whose Name the Bill stood, thus making it impossible for Peers who wished to do so to take any Part on this final Stage.

"2. Because a former Stage, viz., the Second Reading, had been virtually annulled and moved pro formâ only at an hour when by general Admission it was not possible to go into Debate, all Consideration of the Bill being thus reduced to the single Stage of going into Committee on the 29th July.

"3. Because a Resolution of the House has frequently declared, that at that Period important Measures cannot have the full deliberation which they merit.

"4. Because a Precedent has thus been formed for passing to the Statute Book a Measure of organic Change without the genuine and bonâ fide Sanction of the House of Lords; and if such organic Change as the Public Interest requires is now to be developed in a Series of Measures, and not included in a single Scheme, the Danger of such a Precedent being often followed is apparent.

"5. Because while the Bill has not had the bonâ fide Sanction of the House of Lords, so neither has it had that of either Party in the Commons, the Opposition and the Government in that House of Parliament having both declared in the Course of the Session that the vacant Seats ought to be otherwise distributed.

"6. Because so long as these Seats were vacant a notorious Defect in the Reform Act might eventually be remedied, without increasing the Numbers of the House of Commons, the Defect in consequence of which since 1832 distinguished Public Men, against the Wishes of the Country, have been excluded from the Legislature, and which arises from the Want of a corrective Power in the State to return those whom the united Body of the Nation would have chosen, but who from local Circumstances have not been chosen by any of the Sections into which the Country at a General Election is divided.

The Lord Chancellor

"7. Because the Existence of such a Vice in the Reform Act is convincingly established by the Fact, that since 1832 Sir William Molesworth, Lord Macaulay, Lord Carlisle, Sir Edward Lytton, Mr. Bright, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Milner Gibson, the late Mr. Bernal, among others, have, after General Elections, been kept out of Parliament, while the Public could not be said in any of these Cases to have either caused or sanctioned the Exclusion.

"8. Because to form any System by which the casual Deficiencies of a General Election might be afterwards removed, according to the Interest and Voice of the Community, the four vacant Seats, if not essential, were desirable, as the Space to build on; while they are now appropriated in a Manner which no Necessity dictated, which meets no popular Demand, which takes away no Public Inconvenience, and bestows no Kind of new advantage on the Empire.

"9. Because the Defect to some Remedy of which these Seats might have been devoted leads to serious Results beyond a palpable Anomaly. An Anomaly of this Kind occurs when a State, however firm in its Opinion that given Individuals ought to serve it in its Representative Assembly, has no Power to return them if they have been outvoted by a single local Body at a General Election, and that upon an Issue joined not of Merit, but of Party.

"10. Because before 1832 the State had the Power in question by a Medium it is not now desirable to call again into existence, the Opposition and the Government possessing at that Time the Means of bringing into Parliament distinguished Men whom the General Election had excluded by the Boroughs which each had at its Disposal. It is only, therefore, necessary that an important End which was gained for many Years by objectionable Means should be now secured by Means which are legitimate.

"11. Because, whatever Means are now resorted to to invest the State with this necessary Power since the vacant Seats have been appropriated, such Means can only be applied by increasing the Number of the House of Commons beyond a point which is generally felt to be excessive. In order, therefore, to remove One Evil in our representative Arrangements, it becomes essential in some degree to aggravate another, a Dilemma into which States may be forced by various Events, but which it is against the Rules of Policy to choose and to create by doubtful Legislation.

"12. Because among the Results of the Evil it has thus become more difficult to remedy, the State may be and has been in this Manner deprived of official Talent it requires, but which can only be exerted in conjunction with a Seat in Parliament. Beyond this, until the Country has the Power, after a General Election, of calling to its Repre-representative Assembly those whom it deems erroneously excluded, Public Life must always be embraced with the Risk at any Moment of an arbitrary Exile, such as no other Career involves. It cannot, therefore, be embraced by Men whom Prudence governs, and whom the State would most desire to draw into its Service. In effect it is confined to the few whose Property or Family insure a permanent Connexion with a County or a Borough; and at every Change in the Reform Act these few are likely to become fewer.

"13. Because, apart from the Public Wrong these vacant Seats might have been devoted to removing, a Bill which increases the Number of the County at the Expense of the Borough Members, and forms Constituencies open to none but Persons locally connected with them, in place of Constituencies at which all Public Men might equally be Candidates, appears retrograde in Character, and ought not to have been passed without a greater Show of Argument to vindicate it.

"14. Because the Gift of Two Seats to the West Riding of Yorkshire, not to come into use until a Dissolution, is an uncalled for Sacrifice of the deliberative Freedom which might have otherwise employed them, and is no present Gain to the Locality it favours. AFFAIRS OF CHINA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any further Papers regarding affairs in China are to be given to Members?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that no additional papers with regard to China were in preparation at the Foreign Office, and he was not aware that any more were required.

On Motion that the House at its rising adjourn until Monday.

IRISH DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BLAKE, in rising to call the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the want which existed in the Irish district lunatic asylums of sufficient necessary appliances for promoting the happiness and recovery of the insane, said, he desired to draw the attention of the right hon. Baronet to this subject with a view of inducing him, by personal inquiry, to satisfy himself as to whether the statement which he would make regarding the defects in the Irish asylums were correct or not; and besides, if the things he complained of were not remedied before next Session, he would, if nothing prevented him, take an early opportunity, after the assembling of Parliament, to again bring forward the subject. Up to about thirty years ago the places for the detention of the insane poor in Ireland—for they did not deserve the name of institutions—were, he believed, in as deplorable a state as those of the United Kingdom generally—lunatics being for the most part treated like, and incarcerated with, criminals. About that time, however, a much better state of things arose. District asylums were erected in various parts of the country, which in point of construction, management, and comfort, were far beyond anything of the kind which had previously existed. The arrangements made for the care, treatment, and recovery of the patients were also very superior, as compared with the old system, and quite as good in every respect as anything of the kind then in operation in the kingdom, and very great results for the happiness of the insane followed. But he was sorry to say that those institutions by no means kept pace with the advance made by others, to which he would presently allude, in certain important particulars for alleviating the condition and promoting the recovery of the insane. It was difficult to know to whom to attach most blame for this; but those holding the highest positions in the administration of the affairs of the country certainly deserved their share of censure; and this might be said of every successive Government, as they each helped more or less to perpetuate a state of things calling strongly for amendment. There was, however, one honourable exception in the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman). When that right hon. Gentleman was Chief Secretary he had sagacity enough to see that there was much in connection with the asylums calling for change, and he moved for, and obtained, a Royal Commission "to inquire into and report on the state of the asylums." The Commissioners consisted of Sir Thomas Redington, Robert Andrews, R. W. S. Lutwidge, James Wilkes, and sitions, experience, and intelligence. Their labours occupied more than a year, and the result was a very admirable Report, to one part of which he wished to direct the attention of the House—that in which the Commissioners recommended agreeable employment and recreation for those not disposed or able to take a part in agricultural labour. The hon. Member read the recommendations of the Report, and also passages from the reports of Dr. Hood, the Resident Physician of the Royal Hospital of Bethlehem, in which he advocates “those occupations for the insane which tend to divert the mind from its delusions, and which rouse and invigorate the healthy exercise of the reflective faculties.” The patients had been permitted to visit many different public exhibitions—the National Gallery, the Crystal Palace, the Zoological Gardens, &c., with marked beneficial effect. Dr. Hood says—

“If we can succeed in giving a patient the impression that we repose confidence in him—if we can make him sensible of the importance of his parole d'honneur, we are greatly improving his mental state; for the recovery of self-respect is often the first indication of impending cure. Hence we find the reports of many lunatic asylums attesting the advantages which patients derive from such excursions.”

Acting on the principle of occupying the patients' minds by agreeable employment and suitable recreation, Dr. Hood left no means untried to interest them, and no better proof could be shown of the soundness of his views than the results which followed, for, whilst in other institutions 20 per cent of discharges on admissions was considered a very satisfactory result, the discharges on admissions at Bethlehem sometimes amounted to 68 per cent. Last year they were nearly 60, and yet the whole first cost of the various matters required in a large asylum for the indoor recreation and employment of the patients would not exceed £100. Dr. Hood frequently sent his patients in walking parties about London, without any unpleasant results occurring, and with great benefit to the patients themselves, an idea that would be and had been ridiculed at some of the Irish asylums. The example of Bethlehem had been followed in some of the English county asylums with good effect. He could speak particularly of Derby, Gloucester, and Leicester, as it was best known to him. There, under the able manager, Dr. Buck, the very same state of things might be seen in operation; and though wages and provisions were higher, the cost of the patients was not more than £2 a head per annum over some of the Irish asylums; and, what was most singular, there was not a wall or sunk fence around the entire of the outer grounds to prevent the patients from escaping. But the reason was easily told. The place was divested, as much as possible, of a prison aspect, and for those not equal to or disposed for agricultural labour there were ample means of occupation and amusement—music, games, books, pictures, birds, pet animals, &c., &c.; and since these things were introduced the patients were manifestly quieter, happier, and recoveries greater. In describing these asylums he by no means meant to convey that they represented England generally—by no means—as he believed the Irish asylums, taken as a whole, were beyond the English ones; but there were in England a few far beyond the others, and better than anything in Ireland, and his object was to bring the latter up to the right standard. It was difficult to know who was to blame for their being so—whether the Government or the higher officials charged with their administration. Sufficient care had not been taken to make appointments from men who had previous experience of the treatment of insanity. For instance, take the inspectors of asylums. Dr. White, since deceased, was, no doubt, an able man well skilled in his profession; Dr. Nugent, who was private physician to Mr. O'Connell; and Dr. Hatchell, also eminent in his profession, were the first inspectors appointed; but not one of these, however eminent they might otherwise be, had any special knowledge of lunacy, or any especial experience in diseases of the mind. Now, he certainly thought that the Inspectors might have done much more than appeared to be done in the way of providing such occupations as he had spoken of for the patients' minds. Go into any county asylum in Ireland, after visiting Derby or Leicester, and the difference was very apparent in this respect. Let them take the instance of Waterford, with which he was best acquainted, and there they would find the patients not engaged in agricultural labour, shut up in yards, with walls so high that the poor lunatics had no prospect but the sky over their heads or the gravel under their feet; and when obliged to remain within doors they were huddled together in day-rooms, such as those described in the Report of the Royal Commission, without having anything to interest them, and the consequence was you would see more real signs of insanity in a room containing twenty patients than all over the Leicester asylum, with its nearly 400; and yet he had no hesitation in saying that Waterford was quite as good in every respect as any other asylum in Ireland; but there was a great absence of the many things, trifling as they were, that would alleviate the dreadful tedium of the poor patients' lives, and help their recovery. There was no reason why the very same resources should not exist in the asylums in Ireland. The expense of everything he had described, even for a large institution, would not cost £50; but the utmost spathy, if not, indeed, prejudice, against such improvements appeared to exist. He had lately gone with a deputation from the Grand Jury of Waterford to visit the district asylum there; they had drawn up a report recommending increased recreation, which appeared to excite the surprise and draw down on him the disapproval of the resident manager, as he wrote to the papers stating there were pictures, plants, birds, and music, to amuse the patients, and wound up by expressing his fears that if patients were too much amused sane people outside might feign madness in order to join them. Now, the whole collection of pictures might be purchased, he thought, for 5s., the plants, perhaps, an equal sum, the birds, which for a long time consisted of only one, had to be caught by an enterprising patient, and the strains of music were only heard when some lunatic was in the vein to play on the fiddle or tambourine; however, when a manager of an asylum was found to express apprehension that if these joys were increased, people might endeavour to get themselves placed amongst lunatics, he thought he could not do better than hand in his letter, as the very strongest piece of evidence in support of his assertion that the Irish asylums needed reformation. All he now sought was to interest the right hon. Baronet in the subject, and to induce him to visit the two or three English asylums he had described, and then visit some of the Irish ones. He was quite sure when he had done so that he would agree with him that his description had not been exaggerated. He advocated no other reform than that recommended by the Royal Commission, and in successful operation in the places he had been describing. The late Chief Secretary had promised that new Privy Council rules should be introduced in place of the Bill of his predecessor. In addition to the Inspectors, a Commission like that which formerly existed ought to be formed, and each of the Inspectors ought to have separate districts assigned them, which would cause an emulation which did not now exist. He would now, until next Session, leave the matter in the hands of the right hon. Baronet. He hoped he would visit the asylums of both countries and judge for himself. The illustrious name he bore was associated with some good done for Ireland, and, though he differed with him in many of his opinions, still he believed he usually meant what he said. A few days before he had given expression to kindly sentiments towards Ireland, and, as he (Mr. Blake) was confident there was no subject more worthy of his attention than the one he had that day brought under his notice, he had every hope that he would not lose sight of it, but would give to it that consideration which the claims of the poor beings for whose amelioration he pleaded deserved from one occupying a position enabling him to benefit them.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he had no doubt the right hon. Baronet would devote himself during the recess to the consideration of the question which had just been submitted to his notice, and bore testimony to the efficiency of Dr. White, who up to the period of his decease had discharged his duty as an Inspector of Lunatics with the utmost zeal, adding also the expression of his opinion as to the manly and able manner in which Drs. Nugent and Hatchel performed their duties in a similar capacity.

IRISH BILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY wished to know from the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland, What had become of the Bill relating to the removal of certain penalties now imposed by law in the case of clergyman marrying a Protestant and Roman Catholic in Ireland, which had been introduced in the early part of the Session by the late Lord Chancellor in the other House of Parliament: also what had become of the Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages (Ireland) Bill, as well as that relating to the better regulation of Fairs and Markets in the country, which had been introduced early in the Session by the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary (Mr. Cardwell)? In calling attention, however, to the postponement of those Bills, he must not forget to be just to the Government, and to give them credit for a practical piece of legislation in the shape of the Salaries of County Surveyors Bill, another measure called the "Drunkenness in Ireland Bill," which he could never understand, and another giving two gentlemen £200 a year each for doing something in connection with Irish voters. There was, at the same time, a subject of great importance—Education in Ireland—which had not been dealt with, and which would come under the attention of the right hon. Baronet almost the instant he set his foot on the pier at Kingstown. With that question he hoped his right hon. Friend would at once grapple, using his own judgment in the matter, and setting aside the suggestions which might come from quarters on which reliance ought not to be placed. In conclusion, he had merely to add that he did not think the late Chief Secretary for Ireland was much to be blamed for the absence of legislation for Ireland in the present Session, seeing that he was deprived of the assistance in the House of both the law officers for that country—a position in which no Chief Secretary had been placed since the Union. Blame attached rather to the Prime Minister and the Government. He was afraid that the present Chief Secretary would remain for some time in the same unenviable position; but still he hoped that the right hon. Baronet would do something during the recess to promote the social happiness and the material prosperity of the Irish people.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I am obliged to the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) for drawing my attention to the important subject of lunatic asylums in Ireland. I concur in the humane views which he has expressed with respect to the necessity and importance of introducing into those institutions everything that may tend to alleviate the sufferings of the inmates and to facilitate, as much as possible, their restoration to a sound state of health in mind and body. Happily in Ireland, as well as elsewhere, the time is long past when lunatics were treated like criminals; but I really admit that, in addition to kindly treatment, it is highly desirable that the monotony and desolation of mind endured by patients in lunatic asylums should be relieved by occupation and amusement. I do not think that the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commission of Inquiry to which the hon. Member has adverted, and which sat in 1858, have been sufficiently attended to. The Commissioners urged the necessity and advantage of introducing a system of recreation and amusement into lunatic asylums; but the hon. Member must know that the remedy for the evils which he has pointed out is a matter not within the province of the Government, but depends upon the local Boards. The district lunatic asylums are governed by Boards which are sustained by local rates, and, although it is true that the law gives the Lord Lieutenant considerable powers, yet it is obvious that it would not be desirable that he should exercise them, except in extreme cases. The hon. Member says that the monotony of lunatic asylums should be relieved by books and music. No doubt such means of recreation and amusement would be very valuable; but their introduction depends upon the Board of Directors of each asylum, and if the Lord Lieutenant were to exercise the power conferred upon him by the law, I am afraid such exercise would be regarded by the local Boards as an unwarrantable interference with the rights and authority of the cess payers. The hon. Member, in contrasting the lunatic asylums in Ireland with those of England, found fault particularly with the asylum at Clonmel. I believe that the condition of that institution is not so unfavourable as the hon. Member has described it to be. The hon. Member told us that the condition of the asylums in England—and he particularly mentioned those of Gloucester and Leicester—is much superior to the condition of the asylums in Ireland. I find it stated, however, in the Ninth Report on the district asylums in Ireland that "the sanitary condition of such asylums from 1857 to 1859-60 was most favourable," and that "the comforts in Irish asylums are daily on the increase." The hon. Member gave us an unfavourable account of the asylum at Waterford, and I am aware that he made similar statements in a recent address to the grand jury of that city. Since the delivery of that address I have received a counter-statement from a person who visited the asylum in consequence, and who says—

"We found the whole building clean and orderly, pictures on the walls, draughts, &c., for the amusement of patients, books, and an instrument of music, which had evidently been in frequent use. As regards employment, patients were engaged in making shoes, knitting, sewing, making clothes, gardening, farming, &c. There are ten acres of land connected with this asylum, divided and sub-divided, the entire work on the land and gardens being performed by patients."

I think, therefore, that the condition of the Waterford Asylum is not such as to warrant the severe censure which the hon. Member has pronounced upon that institution. The hon. Member referred to some assurance given by my predecessor in connection with a Bill which was dropped two years ago on the understanding that steps would be taken by the Government to improve the management of the Irish lunatic asylums. I am happy to be able to inform the hon. Member that steps have been taken in the matter, and that new and improved rules have been drawn up under the orders of the Privy Council. I cannot agree with the hon. Member that the condition of the asylums in Ireland is so very unfavourable as compared with the asylums in England. The reverse is the case; and it is somewhat remarkable that the condition of the asylums in Ireland is considerably better than the condition of the asylums in England or in Scotland, or even in France. I have read the report to which the hon. Member has referred, very carefully, and I find that the percentage of recoveries, whether considered by admissions annually or by total number of patients under treatment, is greater in the Irish district lunatic asylums than in those of other countries. It is more favourable than in Scotland or than in England. Of the daily average under treatment—and this is very important—16 per cent are cured in Ireland, about 13 per cent in France, and about 10 per cent in England. In four years the deaths by casualties in Ireland among the insane in lunatic asylums were sixteen in all; but in England during the same period they were 124. Those facts show, I think, that the lunatic asylums in Ireland are, upon the whole, well and satisfactorily governed. No doubt improvements may be introduced, and when I go to Ireland I shall be happy to give this matter my best attention.

Turning now to the remarks of the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy), I am afraid I cannot state the reasons why the Bills to which he has referred have been dropped; but I may be permitted to say that next Session, should I continue to hold the office of Chief Secretary, and should any measures relating to Ireland be dropped, I shall be quite prepared to give the reasons. I have no doubt my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Cardwell) will be able to reply to the observations of the hon. Member opposite. In conclusion, I wish to take this opportunity of assuring Irish Members and the House generally that I shall never grudge any time or attention for the purpose of considering whatever may be necessary for the interests of the lunatic asylums and all other public institutions in Ireland, and that I shall cheerfully co-operate with hon. Gentlemen on both sides in endeavouring to promote whatever measures which may tend to the improvement, progress, and advancement of Ireland.

MR. CARDWELL said, he thought the hon. Member for Waterford was not aware that new regulations for the administration of affairs in lunacy had been prepared by a Commission specially appointed for the purpose, and that those regulations only waited the arrival of the right hon. Baronet in Ireland to be finally sanctioned. With respect to amusements in lunatic asylums in Ireland, his experience did not correspond with that of the hon. Member; for when he visited the Belfast asylum the patients were drawn up in military array, and were obviously enjoying a recreation well calculated to divert their minds. He believed, moreover, that in a curative point of view no asylum stood higher than that of Belfast. A great deal had been done during the last two years to supply the deficiency of accommodation for the care and cure of lunatics in Ireland. Many new asylums had been ordered, and he had no doubt that in a short time the whole of the accommodation recommended by the Redington Commission would be furnished. In reply to the questions of the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) he had to state that the Bill for repealing the penal statute affecting Roman Catholic mixed marriages was withdrawn at the request of a large number of the Roman Catholic Members of that House, including the hon. Gentleman himself. He had received a communication from those hon. Gentlemen which led him to believe that the measure was not acceptable to them, and that he should not receive their support in proceeding with it. The other two measures to which the hon. Member had referred—the Registration of Marriages Bill and the Fairs and Markets Bill, related to subjects of great difficulty and importance, subjects which had engaged the attention of Parliament for many years, and were introduced early in the Session. These two measures were referred to Select Committees which made their Reports to the House. Why, then, it was asked, did they not make progress in the House? The reason was not any unwillingness on the part of the Government, for they were most anxious to complete them, but because many of the Irish Members had to attend the summer assizes, and such measures could not be proceeded with in their absence. With regard to the Bill for the Registration of Marriages, it was quite true that the Committee had come to an all but unanimous conclusion; but, contrary to his protest, they had inserted a clause in the Bill giving to clergymen registering a marriage in Ireland exactly five times the remuneration that was given to clergymen in England, and charged it not on the local rates but on the Consolidated Fund. Now, it must be quite manifest to the House that it was totally impossible for him as a Member of the Government to recommend that clause to the adoption of the House; and it must be equally manifest that in the absence of the Irish Members he could not ask the House to reverse the decision of the Committee. There was no alternative, therefore, but to leave the matter over till next Session. So, also, with regard to the Fairs and Markets Bill, the Committee arrived at a unanimous conclusion. It touched vested interests and affected the regulation of traffic, both wholesale and retail, throughout the whole kingdom; and any Minister would be most culpable who attempted to make progress with such a measure in the absence of the Irish Members. The first of the three Bills then was not proceeded with, because those it was intended to relieve were desirous it should not be proceeded with; and, with regard to the two others, notice had been given by the Government on the very first day of the Session that they would be introduced on an early day; they were so introduced, they were referred to a Select Committee, but they could not be proceeded with in the House in consequence of the absence of the Irish Members at the summer assizes.

COLONEL DUNNE thought the chief fault of the lunacy establishments in Ireland was the appointment of the Governors, who were nominated by the Lord Lieutenant, often as a matter of caprice. They ought, in his opinion, always to be connected with the financial distribution of the country.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH wished, on the last day of the Session, to elicit some words of wisdom from the noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government in relation to a question which had lost an eloquent exponent in that House, owing to the acceptance of office by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel). The despatches published by the Foreign Minister in the autumn of 1859 were all that could be wished; but his answer to the right hon. Baronet the other day seemed to give a new version to the case. The noble Lord the other day appeared to consider that he had made an engagement as to Tangiers, but that as to Tetuan he said nothing in direct terms, and that in harmony with his despatch he could allow Tetuan to be occupied permanently by an European Power. The fact was that Tetuan and the country up to Ceuta was nearer to Gibraltar than Tangiers was. The passage by land to Tangiers was easy, and there would be no difficulty in a force from Tetuan taking possession of that town. There could be no doubt that if the Spanish forces held possession of the coast of Morocco our communications with Gibraltar and the Mediterranean would be greatly interfered with. At present the Spaniards held possession of Melilla, upon the confines of French Algeria, and the extension of their power over the coast between the two points, which must follow, would leave the whole seaboard in the possession of Spain, who might at any time be made a catspaw by France to injure this country. If the recent conduct of the noble Lord had been actuated by any desire to make a firm friendship with Spain it was an entire mistake. The only means of obtaining a sincere alliance with Spain must be by the surrender of Gibraltar. So long as we retained Gibraltar, which was a thorn and offence in their side, every Spaniard would detest the name of England. We had taken Gibraltar by a coup de main, and the Spaniards had repeatedly made attempts to recover it, in alliance with France; and it was vain to expect that they would prefer the alliance of England to that of France so long as they hoped to wrest the fortress from us. It was futile to expect any gratitude for our exertions during the Peninsular War, because Spaniards argued, first that what we did was with a view to our own interests; and next, that if we had let them alone they would have driven Napoleon out of the country much sooner than was the case with our assistance. He would remind the noble Lord of the opinion expressed by Mr. Fox that if Gibraltar were given up to Spain the Mediterranean would become a lake from which she could exclude us whenever she pleased. He wished to ask the noble Lord, Whether there was any intention on the part of the Government to allow any European Power to obtain possession of Tetuan or of any part of the coast of Morocco in the Mediterranean, with reference to the security of the fortress of Gibraltar?

THE STATE OF NAPLES.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that before the noble Lord rose to reply, he wished to ask two questions of great importance. By the capitulation of Gaeta the Swiss troops in the service of the King of Naples were allowed to remain in Naples; but it appeared from the accounts in that day's Times, that this portion of the capitulation had been violated, and Baron Ricasoli had ordered that the Swiss should leave Naples. Remonstrance had been made by the Minister from the Swiss Republic, and he (Sir George Bowyer) was anxious to know the rights of the matter, and whether Her Majesty's Government would exercise their influence to insure justice to the Swiss? Seeing upon the Treasury bench the great champion of Swiss rights, he had no doubt the subject would receive due attention from him, and he hoped the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) who, while out of office had shown such desire to protect the freedom of Switzerland, and to prevent the encroachment of France through corrupt transactions between Sardinia and France would, now he was in office, show a like amount of zeal. The other question which he wished to ask related to a matter of still greater importance. He wished to ask whether Her Majesty's Government would exert their influence with Foreign Powers, and especially with Italy, to obtain justice and fair play for the population of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. Without going into particulars, he might say that all accounts, public and private, showed that the state of things in that kingdom was most dreadful, bordering upon anarchy, if not anarchy itself. There was not even the ordinary security for life and property which Governments afforded to their subjects. The country was exposed to an armed despotism, and ruled by a cruel repression. It had been said that the Piedmontese had been received as deliverers by the population of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies; but how incorrect that statement was was shown in the correspondence of The Times, which was probably the most accurate of our sources of information. The disbanded army had nothing to do with the state of feeling which prevailed. The people were put down by movable columns, directed against persons who were called brigands, though it was a perfect absurdity to call them anything of the sort. He could produce evidence that these persons were not merely disbanded soldiers, nor in any sense of the word brigands, but the population of the country, who, if they had a chance, were ready to rise as one man to recall their rightful Sovereign, to whom they were still attached. They did not wish their country to be a province of Piedmont. Naples was the fourth city in Europe in importance and population, and that great city did not like to become a provincial town under Turin, and would never submit to such a fate. He had been informed that the Emperor of the French remonstrated against the cruelties committed by the Piedmontese in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. Last year, when he called attention to the bloodthirsty proclamation issued by General Pinelli, he was told that Pinelli had been dismissed. He did not believe that that was so, but, however that might be, Pinelli was now in that country with full powers. General Cialdini was in Naples with full military powers, superseding the civil authority altogether. The Government of Naples was one altogether of martial law. General Cialdini was a soldier, and nothing else, and he would stick at nothing necessary to carry out the object he had in view. The people were trampled under foot, and he wished to know whether the (Her Majesty's) Government would use the influence they undoubtedly possessed to put a stop to this state of things? No doubt the noble Lord would tell him that by a vote of the people—a plébiscite as it was called—Naples was united to the pretended Kingdom of Italy. He was sure, however, that the noble Lord could not attach any importance to this so-called plébiscite, which had been carried out without any freedom of election. He knew of an instance where a person went to give his vote for the recall of Francis II., but was trampled under foot by the Garibaldians, and died of his injuries. There were no voting papers to be got for the recall of Francis II. The process of taking the votes of the people for the annexation to Piedmont was a cruel and wicked mockery, as was abundantly proved by what had subsequently occurred. If the people had really been in favour of annexation martial law would not be necessary, and it was only by martial law that Naples was now governed. If Francis II. had had less moderation and humanity, and had not dreaded the bloodshed which would have followed, there would have been a general uprising throughout the country for his recall. But the people were now kept down by a large military force, and by a rigid and cruel military despotism. They had no chance of asserting their own rights. The rights of the Neapolitan people to self-government, and the nationality and independence of the ancient and noble Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, were as sacred as the rights of Poland or of any other of the nationalities of which so much was talked now-a-days. The people of Naples detested Piedmont—the Piedmontese soldiers could not show themselves, but had to be shut up in fortresses. The people of the city of Naples were only kept under by the fear of a bombardment from St. Elmo, which Garibaldi wished to destroy, but which the King of Piedmont, knowing how necessary it would be to him, had preserved. Francis II. left Naples because he did not wish its inhabitants to be exposed to the horrors of war; but the Piedmontese monarch had no such feelings, and the Neapolitans knew that they would be crushed by a bombardment from St. Elmo if they moved. Her Majesty's Government pretended to be great friends of liberty and of nationalities, and he wished to know whether they would take into their consideration the position of this unfortunate people? He did not want from the noble Viscount any party speech, or any commonplaces about Italian unity and Italian nationality. He wanted him to apply himself to the facts, which were undeniable. He wished to hear from him whether he would use his influence to obtain for the people of Naples fair play—deliverance from the tyranny under which they were placed, and the opportunity of deciding for themselves, without the interference of Piedmontese soldiers, whether they would be under the Piedmontese Government or not? He was sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present. The right hon. Gentleman had written a pamphlet some years ago about Baron Pocrio, and other persons, who were imprisoned under the authority of the King of Naples, and he (Sir George Bowyer) wanted the right hon. Gentleman now to write a pamphlet giving an account of the imprisonment of thousands and thousands of persons in Naples, and the execution by military law of hundreds—not men with arms in their hands, but men who were merely considered to be disaffected and reactionaries—that was to say, men who were loyal subjects—even priests, who were loyal to their King. He was afraid, however, that the right hon. Gentleman's sympathies were all on the other side, and that his indignation was all directed against the lawful Sovereign, who had punished those who had attempted to overturn his throne. He hoped that the noble Lord would use all his influence to put a stop to the present state of things in Naples, and to obtain for the people of the Two Sicilies the real liberty of determining for themselves whether they were satisfied to become a province of Piedmont, or whether they would prefer that their own King and their own Royal Family should return to rule over them.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—The hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Darby Griffith) wishes to know what has passed in regard to the disputes between Spain and Morocco as to the occupation by Spain of certain points in the territory of Morocco. The original dispute between Spain and Morocco was a very unfortunate one. It is not for me to enter into the merits of it, but I think more explanation and a clearer understanding might have prevented the war. The result of the war, however, was that the Emperor of Morocco was to pay a certain amount of money to the Spanish Government as compensation for the expenses incurred in that war. This was to be paid by instalments, and the town of Tetuan was to be occupied by the Spanish Government for a certain period until a certain proportion of that indemnity was paid. The Emperor of Morocco, however, was under a mistaken impression as to the amount of treasure which he possessed. He imagined that he had in the Treasury of the State a larger sum than afterwards turned out to be there. That created a difficulty in regard to the payment of the instalments. Moreover, the present Sultan had succeeded to his father during the contest, and his authority was not firmly established in every part of his dominions, there being another brother who had the support of a certain party; and there was not, therefore, entire acquiescence in his succession to the Throne. This, also, created an additional difficulty in the way of a settlement with the Spanish Commissioners. The Moorish people, with a good deal of national feeling and religious enthusiasm, were indignant that money should be sent to the Spanish Government to pay the expenses of the war, and the Government of Morocco was unable to pay the stipulated sums. This gave rise to long negotiation and a protracted occupation of Tetuan by the Spanish forces. Those negotiations are still continuing, and, as far as Her Majesty's Government, by any good offices in Morocco, can assist the settlement of this dispute, I can assure the hon. Member and the House those good offices will be employed. In fact, Mr. Drummond Hay has gone to the seat of Government in Morocco to endeavour to make some arrangement. I have no reason to suppose that the Spanish Government has any intention of keeping a permanent occupation in Tetuan. The occupation is very expensive to the Spanish Government; and I believe that it only holds the place till peace is restored between the two countries. Any apprehensions, therefore, that may be entertained of a permanent occupation of Tetuan are not founded, as far as we are informed, on any real basis. With regard to the questions of the hon. Baronet who has just sat down (Sir George Bowyer), he wishes, first, to know what has been done in reference to certain Swiss troops that formed part of the garrison of Gaeta, and that have now been ordered by General Cialdini to leave Naples. I am rather inclined to believe that the Swiss Government has recalled these troops; but except generally I am not informed of the nature of the transaction. As to the other question of the hon. Baronet, he says the people of Naples are not willing to transfer their allegiance to Victor Emmanuel, and that their country should become part of the Kingdom of Italy. But if they were not willing to become subjects of the King of Italy, they must be a very extraordinary people; for it is well known that the Government of Naples was, with the exception of that of Rome, the worst Government in the world. The Neapolitans must have been the most extraordinary people on the face of the earth if they were unwilling to transfer their allegiance from their former Government to that of Sardinia. But the fact is notoriously the contrary. It is perfectly well known to everybody that when Garibaldi, with six friends, arrived at Naples in a railway carriage to deliver the people from their former Government they were received with acclamation. At that moment there were in Naples 3,000 or 4,000 troops, in the service of the late King; but, instead of assembling at the railway station, and seizing and shooting Garibaldi, these troops quietly acquiesced in the transaction. As far, then, as that goes, the matter turned on the spontaneous feeling and general acclamation of the people. The hon. Baronet says the country is in a very disturbed state; but in doing so he makes two assertions that are rather incompatible with each other. He says the country is governed by martial law, its power, of course, exercised by the Sardinian troops; but he also says these troops are so hated that they dare not show themselves, and that they are obliged to be confined to the fortresses. If that is so the troops cannot exercise the authority of which the hon. Baronet speaks. [SIR GEORGE BOWYER: I said, except in moveable columns.] Well, if these are moveable columns they are not confined to fortresses and dare show themselves.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: What I intended to say was that when these troops were in arms and traversed the country in moveable columns they exercised control over the country; but that individual soldiers dared not show themselves and they were confined to the fortresses.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I do not wish to raise any discussion on that point. No doubt, there are bodies of troops traversing the country for the purpose of preventing every sort of outrage being committed, and restoring security for life and property. The hon. Baronet says, the people who commit these outrages are not brigands. Well, perhaps they are not brigands in the ordinary sense of the word. Brigands rob and plunder for a subsistence; they take what they want for their own use. They seize travellers and carry them up to the mountains to extort a ransom, sending their prisoners down whole if they get the whole of the money, and piecemeal if they get it in portions. But these men of whom the right hon. Baronet speaks are much worse than brigands; they commit every sort of atrocity, not for money, but as a political vengeance. They are the instruments of the political vengeance of persons who live in safety in the city of Rome. These persons send out these men by hundreds. They are furnished—I will not say by whom—with arms and money in great quantities. Some of their arms were those which some time since were handed over to the Roman Government to be kept in security when a portion of the garrison of Gaeta made their escape and took refuge in the Roman States, when they were disarmed by the French troops. Their arms are sent by parties in the holy city of Rome, to commit the most unholy acts, to disturb public tranquillity, to murder, to torture, to burn people alive, to perpetrate every sort of atrocity. These are the sort of persons the hon. Baronet takes into his tender compassion, whom he is sorry to see put down by these moveable bodies of troops, and in whose behalf he wishes the English Government to exert itself to procure them impunity. I can assure the hon. Baronet, with great satisfaction, that the English Government will do no such thing. We hope that the vigour of Cialdini and Pignelli will succeed in restoring security in the disturbed districts of the Neapolitan territory; we trust that by a vigorous application, where alone these outrages are committed, of these moveable columns the wretches who perpetrate these crimes will receive their proper punishment, in the course of no great length of time; and that the population will be relieved from the misfortunes that have been brought on them from Rome. I have no doubt at all as to the general feeling of the people of the Neapolitan territory. My opinion is diametrically opposite to that of the hon. Baronet. I am convinced that they are fully sensible of the benefits that will accrue to them from forming part of the Kingdom of Italy, governed by a constitutional Government, instead of the iron despotism under which they have so long groaned, and under which their fathers and grandfathers have been so much demoralized.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, the noble Lord had rather avoided than answered the question of the hon. Member for Devizes. There was a singular contradiction between his statement as to the Spanish dispute with Morocco and the statement of the Foreign Secretary some time since. Lord John Russell distinctly said that he had received from the Spanish Government an official intimation that it was their intention permanently to occupy the fortress of Tetuan. The noble Lord now said the Government had no information that led it to suppose Spain intended such an occupation of Tetuan, or any part of the coast. But not only was Spain occupying the place; it had been officially announced that it intended to convert it into a fortress of the first class, and to occupy the whole of the country adjoining, so as to make the Spanish possessions extend from Ceuta to Tetuan. Further, they intended to convert Tetuan into a fortress capable of containing a garrison of 15,000 men. He must press upon the Government the necessity of not allowing any such occupation. The Duke of Wellington had pointed out the importance of continuing this coast in the hands of the native Powers, and the noble Lord himself had once said that no permanent occupation of these points by Spain could be permitted. This was no new design on the part of the Spanish Government; they had persistently pursued it for many years; and it might be ascribed to the former opposition of the noble Lord that it had not been carried into effect sooner. The Moorish debt never could be paid; and the pretence, on the part of the Spanish Government who was in debt to all the world, and never paid even when they had the power, was a piece of unparalleled impudence and assurance. Remembering that the noble Lord had himself charged the Spanish Government with breach of faith in regard to their obligations with foreign Powers, it was surprising that he should permit the Spanish Government to shelter itself in their occupation of this territory under the plea that the Government of Morocco had not fulfilled the stipulations of the treaty. The noble Lord said he regarded this as a temporary occupation; whereas he (Mr. S. FitzGerald) was convinced that this was the first step in the occupation of the whole coast from Tetuan to Ceuta, and from Ceuta to Tangier. Any English Government, however, that would permit such an occupation of the African coast by the Spanish Government would neglect, in the highest degree, the interests of England.

Viscount Palmerston

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON wished to explain that the difference between his statement and that of his noble Friend (Earl Russell) might be explained by what he was about to state. There had been a great misunderstanding between the Governments of Spain and Morocco. At one time the Emperor of Morocco was supposed to have said that he would not fulfil his engagements, and that he would not pay a shilling more. The Spanish Government then said, "We will take permanent possession of Tetuan." He was, however, in hopes that the Emperor of Morocco would fulfil his engagements, and he could not doubt that under these circumstances the Spanish Government would fulfil theirs and evacuate Tetuan.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, it was only a week since the authoritative announcement was made in the Spanish Gazette.

CONVOCAATION AND THE CANONS.

QUESTION.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that the Convocation of York have postponed discussing the repeal of the 29th Canon of 1603 until next November: if they have done so, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to recommend that the Royal Assent be given to the Canon which has been recently passed by the Convocation of Canterbury, repealing the 29th Canon, and enacting another Canon in its place: and, whether the Canon law, as contained in the 29th Canon of 1603, respecting sponsors, is not part of the statute law, it having been incorporated in the English and Irish Acts of Uniformity of Charles the Second; and if so, whether the Convention of the Irish Province, as part of the United Church of England and Ireland, have, in accordance with the letter and spirit of the Acts of Union, been consulted respecting the proposed alteration in the law respecting sponsors?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Government had no information which enabled him to answer the first question of the hon. Member. It was possible the Convocation of York had postponed the consideration of the canon. No application had been made for the Royal Assent to the canon passed by the Convocation of Canterbury, and the application had probably been postponed until the matter had been considered by the Convocation of both provinces. In answer to the third question, he might state that an opinion had been taken, not by the Government, but by private persons, as to the effect of the statute law. The opinion was that it was doubtful whether the Royal Assent would give validity to the proceedings of Convocation without the sanction of Parliament.

THE STATE OF ITALY.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to express his thanks to the noble Lord at the head of the Government for the explanation he had given with respect to the position of affairs in Italy. The fact was, he (Mr. Newdegate) believed, that Italy was at the present moment the victim of disturbances created by the Jesuit party in Rome, and that the state of things in that country was only a parallel to that which they had attempted to produce in this, and in every country where they had lost power. A most remarkable document was in existence, showing what was the spirit by which they were animated at Naples. In the year 1854, if he remembered the date correctly, a difference arose between the Minister of the late King of Naples and the Provincial of the Jesuits. The Minister conceived that the Jesuits were maintaining their power over that Sovereign in an offensive manner, and he called the Provincial of the Order to account for that assumption of power. In the apology which that ecclesiastic then made he stated that he and the whole body with which he was connected were devoted to the system of absolute monarchy; he offered to produce the signature of every Jesuit in Naples to attest the fact that they were bound by their constitution to promote that system of government; and he tendered to the King the allegiance of the Order, because that Sovereign governed Naples and Sicily upon the system of absolutism. When, therefore, it was pretended in that House, or elsewhere, that these disturbances in Sicily and in Naples were created for the purpose of restoring liberty to those countries in any form, he (Mr. Newdegate) begged to state the fact he had referred to as a proof that the instigators of those movements which had been denounced by all Europe were men who were firmly devoted to the promotion of absolute government, and that if they should unhappily succeed in overturning the present state of things in Italy, it must be for the purpose of re-establishing a despotism as grinding as that from which the Italians had just escaped. Recent events in Mexico showed that that party were as much attached to absolute power in the hands of a President as in those of a King, and that they could use it with not less frightful cruelty. The first exertions of Garibaldi had been directed against the domination of the creature of the priests in Mexico, Santa Anna, and at this moment, when this party had lost power, the most grievous outrages were committed against British subjects, as well as against the natives in that country. When, therefore, the advocates of the Jesuit party represented them as the friends of toleration and of freedom he trusted that no one would be so blind as not to see that this was a mere pretence, and that the re-establishment of despotism could be the only result of the triumph of a party which had already been guilty of every enormity that could outrage humanity. Such was the history of that Order, and he sincerely hoped that the future liberties of Italy would be established and guarded by stringent measures which were absolutely necessary in order to free the country from these political marauders before it could enjoy either peace or freedom.

STRIKE IN THE BUILDING TRADES.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. AYRTON rose to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to a Petition which he had to present on a subject that had excited great interest throughout the country. The petition emanated from 6,000 working men, who complained of the employment of Sappers and Miners in building the new barracks at Chelsea. The circumstances stated in the petition were these:—Some time ago a builder named Higgs had taken a contract from the Government for the construction of these barracks. After he had made that contract he determined to alter his mode of paying his workmen, and to pay them in future by the hour. His men, thereupon, declined to continue in his employ. He believed that out of about 400 masters in the Metropolis only about twenty-five had adopted this new and as the men believed most objectionable and demoralizing mode of paying their workmen. The consequence was that the men refused to work upon these terms, and the contractor could not get persons to carry on the building. Instead of calling upon Mr. Higgs to fulfil his contract, and if he failed to do so giving the work to other contractors, the Government had, it appeared, sent for a body of Sappers and Miners, and let them to the contractor. This proceeding had astonished the working people, and the only justification he had heard of it was that the work was to be done for the army, and it was necessary that it should be completed at as early a period as possible. That would be a good reason for rescinding the present contract, and putting a new one in the hands of some person who, by the proper employment of men, might command any amount of labour, but it was no justification for the Government letting out to a private contractor the services of soldiers in the army. It was stated in the petition that the workpeople considered it a grievance that they should be taxed in the first instance to raise an army, and then that that army should be let out in order to prevent them settling among themselves in what manner and under what conditions they should be employed. The petitioners, therefore, prayed that the House would take some steps to put an end to this proceeding. He had no doubt that the course taken by the War Office had been inadvertently adopted without considering its serious consequences. If, whenever a dispute arose between masters and workmen, the Government assumed such an attitude, though they might obtain the cheers of the employers of labour who generally sat in that House, yet just in the same proportion they must alienate from themselves personally the good feeling of the great body of the English workpeople. He trusted that the Secretary of State would be able to announce that the Government would withdraw from the position which they had inadvertently taken up, and that they would at an early day put an end to the employment of these soldiers. He was told that, notwithstanding any topics in dispute between the workmen and the employers, the workmen took a just view of their position, and gave an assurance that they desired to make no difference with respect to works under existing contract; but these masters, with an arrogance which they had better have avoided, insisted on introducing a new system, and the workmen in self-defence withdrew from employment. It was a mistake to say that they "struck" in the technical sense of the term, for it was, in truth, a "lock out" on the part of the masters, because they chose to change the conditions of employment.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that a definite Vote was taken in the present year for the construction of barracks at Chelsea, and a contract was entered into for the building. A difference arose between the contractor and his workpeople, and a number of the latter were discharged. Without going into the causes of the difference, he might state that the result was that the contractor was unable to continue the work with the same number of people as had been previously employed. Under these circumstances the contractor applied some time ago to the War Department for the assistance of the Sappers and Miners, and a company was furnished on the arrangement that the contractor should pay for their services according to the plan which had been previously pursued in such cases. The single object of the War Office in so doing was to accelerate the work, as its speedy completion was of importance to the army and the Government, and it was not at all their wish to interfere in any dispute between an employer and his men, though incidentally it might have had that effect. It certainly was not in contemplation of the Secretary of State that any such feeling as had been adverted to should be produced; and as it was represented to him in strong terms that the workmen considered this as an interference on the part of the Government in the struggle now going on between a portion of the masters in the building trade and their workpeople, and as undoubtedly it must always be a great object that the Government should hold a perfectly neutral position in a matter of that kind, he had caused notice to be given that from the 1st of September this assistance was to be discontinued.

SIR MORTON PETO, as "an employer of labour sitting in that House," said, that so far from the masters with whom he was acquainted having any desire to oppress their workmen, he believed that they would, by the arrangement now being carried out, largely benefit the workpeople. In reference to the subject of the petition, he was very glad, indeed, to hear that the right hon. Baronet had intimated his intention that the employment of soldiers in connection with public works should entirely cease under the circumstances. He could only say that the employers would deprecate, as strongly as possible, the interference of Government in any way in this matter. They felt that it was simply an affair between the workmen and themselves, and that the course of conduct which they had adopted would enable the workpeople to continue on more beneficial terms their engagements. The matter being left between the masters and the men, he was quite sure that the issue would be the universal adoption of payment by the hour, as the fairest mode for both. He fully concurred in the prayer of the petition; and he had another to present with the same object; and though he was sure that what the Government did they did for the best, yet he conceived it was an inadvertence, and was glad it not to be persisted in.

Motion agreed to.

House at its rising to adjourn till Monday next.

RESOLUTIONS.

MR. W. EWART then moved the following Resolutions:—

"1. That, as soon as the Estimates are ready, one night in each week be given to their consideration; Motions on going into Committee of Supply being on that day not permitted, except by express permission of the House.

"2. That on other nights, when Supply is an Order of the Day, the speeches of Members who bring forward Motions on going into Committee of Supply be restricted to the limits of a quarter of an hour.

"3. That when a Bill is referred to a Select Committee the Report of such Committee shall be received, and the Bill stand for further consideration, without the intervention of a Committee of the whole House, unless the House shall order the Bill to be Re-committed.

"4. That such Committees, and all Select Committees, consist of not more than five (or seven) Members, named by the Committee of Selection, who shall choose them for their knowledge of the subject to be submitted to their consideration, and ascertain that they will be able to attend regularly in such Committee.

"5. That no opposed business be proceeded in after the hour of one o'clock in the morning."

The hon. Member said that he had a strong opinion that these Resolutions, if adopted, would be found to be productive of considerable advantage in enabling the House to dispose of the business which came before it, adding, with reference to the last of them, that although the noble Lord at the head of the Government, with a vigour which was quite unexampled, might be able to sit out the discussion which took place night after night until two or three o'clock in the morning, yet the great majority of hon. Members were unable to do so without suffering so much as to look rather like spectres of themselves than living realities. He should not, he further observed, press his Motion on the present occasion if any opposition were offered; but it would, he hoped, be taken into consideration by hon. Members during the recess, and acceded to, if deemed to be calculated to effect the object which he had in view, next Session.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, so soon as the Estimates are ready, one night in each week be given to their consideration; Motions on going into Committee of Supply being, on that day, not permitted, except by express permission of the House."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was not surprised that his hon. Friend did not ask the House to express an opinion on these important Resolutions at present, for it was quite clear it would not be right, in the absence of the great majority of hon. Members, to make such alterations as the hon. Gentleman proposed, particularly when it was borne in mind that the subject with which he dealt was one with reference to which the House had come to a decision already in the course of the present Session. He might, however, observe with respect to the First Resolution, that he thought it was one which very well deserved the attention of the House. If the recommendation of the Committee on Public Business, to the effect that Supply might be set down for Tuesdays, had not been acceded to, the termination of the Session would not, he believed, be so near at hand as it now was; and if, in addition, the suggestion of his hon. Friend, that Supply should be fixed for one day in each week were adopted, and a reasonable certainly afforded that it would come on in due course without any preliminary discussion, increased facilities in the despatch of public business would in all probability be found to be the result. The House would, therefore, he hoped, at the beginning of next Session see reason to agree to the first Resolution, the adoption of which would not, he thought, be found to infringe unduly on the rights of private Members. So far as the second Resolution was concerned, he would simply say that, though he thought it would hardly be advisable to adopt such a rule, he wished hon. Members might be induced to act on the advice which it contained. With respect to the appointment of Committees, hon. Members must feel that there was an important distinction between private and public Bills, and, however desirable it might be to limit the number of Members in the case of Select Committees appointed to inquire into the former, it was not so evident that good would result from applying the same principles to the latter. Any absolute rule on that subject had, he thought, better be avoided. The same might be said with respect to not bringing on any opposed business after one o'clock. As a general rule such was not done, but towards the close of the Session it became of great consequence sometimes to be enabled to do so after that hour. If the House adopted the suggestion of his hon. Friend it would lead to the unavoidable lengthening of the Session; and though hon. Members, and especially the right hon. Gentleman who occupied the Chair, might occasionally feel the inconvenience of sitting so many hours at a stretch, he was sure they would prefer doing so to having the length of the Session increased by three or four weeks in consequence of rising earlier.

MR. PAULL said, that at one time he thought some restriction might advantageously be put upon the liberty of Members to bring forward Motions on going into Committee of Supply, but after consultation with the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, he had seen reason to change his opinion. The views of the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman were identical, and might be expressed as follows:—Members of the House of Commons were not elected for the sole purpose of passing Bills and voting money, but to express the wants and wishes of the people, and to provide remedies for acknowledged grievances. Unless it were competent to every Member of that House to state what was rising in the public mind, and to demand immediate redress, the probability was that discontent would grow and spread out of doors until it reached a height dangerous to the peace of the country. That very afternoon the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had brought forward a grievance only lately known, and had obtained a prompt and satisfactory answer from the Secretary for War. He did not see how they could pretend to limit the extent of speeches; nor did he see what good could arise from superseding the reference of Bills to Committees of the Whole House. He could not approve the Resolutions of the hon. Member for Dumfries.

MR. BASS said, that almost everybody had some reason to complain of the unbusiness-like mode in which the House conducted its affairs. He congratulated the hon. Member for Dumfries, whose Resolutions were exceedingly opportune, upon having obtained to some extent the acquiescence of so high an authority as the Home Secretary, and expressed the hope that early next Session the House might be induced to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet with respect to the first Resolution. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would soon come to see the advantage of curtailing the speeches of Members. Improvement in that respect was not impossible. He believed, indeed, that if Members took one-tenth part as much labour to be concise as they did to be diffuse the grievance would be removed at once; but he was afraid that if they trusted to Members altogether they would be disappointed.

“Return of the Number of Civil Bills and of Ejectments, and the Defences to them, Entered and Tried at the different Courts of Quarter Sessions of Ireland respectively, commencing with the Easter Sessions of 1856 to the Hilary Sessions of 1861, both inclusive; showing also the Number of Appeals to Courts of Assizes from the Decisions of the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and the Number of such Decisions Reversed or Confirmed at each Assizes: Also,

“Return of the Number of Felonies and Misdemeanours Tried at each Quarter Sessions, and of Convictions or Acquittals, within the same period: And also,

“Return of the Number of Appeals from the Decisions of Magistrates, and of the Insolvent Cases Heard at each Quarter Sessions; and to call attention to the Report of the Office of Registry of Deeds.”

The noble Marquess said, that the information which these Returns, if produced, would afford, was necessary to enable Parliament to legislate hereafter with effect on the subject of these Courts. A greater amount of business was now transacted, and transacted in a satisfactory manner, in the Quarter Sessions Courts of Ireland than the public was aware of. It was desirable, however, to improve the character and add to the efficiency of those tribunals; but he did not expect that such a change could be attended with greater economy to the suitor or to the public. There was another matter so urgent that he must earnestly press it upon the immediate attention of the Government. Not a day ought to be lost in dealing with the Registration Office in the city of Dublin. The state of things existing in that office, as disclosed in an official Report presented last April, was quite appalling. Nothing could exceed the utter confusion which prevailed in that important department of the judicial administration of the country. In the Office there were 800 volumes which were totally useless, and other ten volumes had been lost. These evils could not have arisen from the want of due assistance, because in the indexing branch of that Office alone there was a larger staff employed than the whole staff of the Registration Office of the county of Middlesex, where, moreover the number of deeds were half as many again as the deeds in the Registration Office in Dublin for all Ireland. This Office ought, in his opinion, to be placed under the superintendence of the Irish Landed Estates Court, or of some one of the other great Courts in Dublin; and he trusted that the Government would turn its earliest and most careful attention to this subject, with a view to legislation upon it at the beginning of next Session.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, there was no objection whatever to the production of these Returns. In the absence of all his colleagues immediately connected with Ireland, he could only assure the noble Marquess that his observations respecting the state of the Registry Office in Dublin were deserving of the best consideration of the Government. The existence of the Landed Estates Court in Ireland rendered it all the more necessary and important that the office for the registration of deeds should be in a satisfactory condition.

Motion agreed to.

Afterwards—

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that since he had answered the question of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde), he had received an intimation that it was the intention of the Government to issue such an inquiry as the noble Marquess had advocated, with the object of discovering whether any improvement could be effected in the department.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN IN TRADES.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to give Directions that an Inquiry be made into the Employment of Children and Young Persons in Trades and Manufactures not already recognized by law," and said, my Lords, the Motion which I have now to submit to your Lordships, although it is the last, is, I am sure, not the least which to-day claims your attention; and I have no doubt your Lordships will admit that its magnitude and importance justify me in now bringing it before you. It is not necessary for me to detain your Lordships by any lengthened statement. I will, however, explain that in the year 1840 I moved for the appointment of a Commission, and obtained it, for the purpose of instituting an inquiry precisely similar to the one which I am now proposing. That Commission reported in 1842, and a very copious and very valuable body of evidence was collected. I have been often asked why I did not proceed further in legislation on this subject. What I did was this—I was enabled to introduce a Bill for the regulation of the labour of young children in coal mines; measures of an analogous nature were also brought in and passed in respect to printworks and bleachworks; and this year we had a Bill before us extending the provisions of the Factory Acts to lace factories. The difficulty of legislating on this question is very great, because, every special branch of industry having its own peculiarities and special requirements, separate legislation is necessary in each particular case. The introduction of measures of this kind always encounters considerable opposition; and, therefore, it was requisite to wait and watch for the growth of public opinion. Now, public opinion, seeing the good effects which have arisen from past legislation of this character, has come to recognize the advantage in every sense, moral, social, commercial, and political, of proceeding still further in the same direction. It is, likewise, desirable to have a new inquiry, because a long period has elapsed since the Report of 1842 was presented. Since then the evils there pointed out have in some instances been mitigated, in others aggravated and increased; while, moreover, some old trades have become extinct, and, on the other hand, some new trades have been created. Yet the abuses still perpetrated are so great, the mischief attending the existing system so glaring, that the evidence taken before the last Commission affords but a very imperfect indication of what another investigation instituted now might be expected to disclose. My Lords, the trades and employments now subjected to inspection, but as yet not regulated by law, are these:—Tin, copper, lead and zinc mines, metal wares, earthenware, glass, pillow-lace, hosiery, paper-making, paper-staining (new), draw-boy weaving, hand-frame winding and warping, tobacco manufactures, lucifer matches, shirt-making, embroidering, rope and twine making, fustian dressing and cutting, leather-glove making, card-setting, brick-making, black-lead works, and several others. I will now briefly call to your Lordships' attention the general conclusions arrived at by the Commissioners of 1840; and, on the first point—namely, as to age, they state that—

"Instances occur in which children begin to work as early as three or four years of age, not unfrequently at five, and between five and six; while, in general, regular employment commences between seven and eight; that in all cases the persons that employ mere infants and the very youngest children are the parents themselves. Early ages are found principally in the manufacture of pins, earthenware, machine-lace, hosiery, draw-boy weaving," &c.

As to the hours of work the Commissioners remark—

"The instances are rare in which the regular hours of work are less than twelve, including from one hour to one hour and a half for meals; but the nominal hours of work are often no indication of the duration of the labour, the work being not unfrequently continued from thirteen up to eighteen hours consecutively."

With reference to the state of the places in which the work is carried on, they say—

"With some exceptions, the places of work in which the trades are carried on are, in general, lamentably defective in drainage, ventilation, the due regulation of temperature, and cleanliness." . . . They proceed to describe "the disgusting state of filth."

Again, as to the night-work—

"In many trades and manufactures there is no regular night-work; but in others it is so constant as to be a part of the system. . . . Its physical and moral effects on the workpeople, and on the children in particular, are universally stated to be highly injurious."

As to the treatment there are these remarks—

"In every trade there are some establishments where corporal punishment is neither allowed nor practised. In too many cases, however, the child is the servant of the workman . . . the proprietor knowing nothing of the treatment, and never, in the least, concerning himself with the matter. In this position the child is often severely, and sometimes cruelly, used; and in one branch of manufacture, in one district in particular, the treatment is oppressive and brutal to the last degree."

From the evidence produced before the several Commissioners, the following inferences are drawn with respect to the influences of the work on the physical condition of the employed:—

"With few exceptions there is nothing in the nature of the employments included under the present inquiry directly injurious to health; but they are often pursued under circumstances which are so."

They specify "early labour," "long hours of work," "insufficient and unwholesome food," and "bad clothing." Hence, "they are more disposed than others to certain diseases which shorten life," to say nothing of crippled forms, distorted limbs, with all their disabilities and protracted sufferings. I hold it to be very consolatory that, with a few exceptions, there is nothing in the nature of the employment directly injurious to the health of those children. They must live by their labour, and, therefore, it is a great consolation to know that there is nothing injurious in that labour itself. On the subject of the moral effects of this system the testimony is everywhere fearful. Of one town a Commissioner reports—"Hundreds of men are supported by the earnings of their wives and children;" and there are several cases in which parents spend in intoxication the entire earnings of their children. Of another town a Commissioner reports—

"A lower condition of morals could not, I think, be found. Moral feelings and sentiments do not exist among them. They have no morals."

It is stated that education in such homes as the Commissioners describe is either impossible or useless; and of one town the Commissioner, speaking of young persons, observes—

"Their horrid words, their ferocious gestures, their hideous laughter, their brutal, bloated, mindless faces, appal and amaze a stranger."

If your Lordships read through the evidence, you will find in it a picture of a state of things such as you could scarcely suppose to exist in this country; and from their very nature those evils have a tendency to become worse. In fact, they must become worse, day by day, if some remedy be not applied. The state of those young people is especially deplorable in the case of females. No one of these wretched girls can ever rise to the dignity of a wife and mother. That is the opinion of the Commissioners; who, referring to that class, observe that they are "wholly incapable of performing the duties of wives and mothers." I shall conclude, my Lords, with the summing up of Mr. Senior, who, after an attentive consideration of the reports of the several Commissioners, makes these remarks—

"We look with shame and indignation at the pictures of American slavery, but I firmly believe that the children at the worst managed plantations are less over-worked, less tortured, better fed, and quite as well instructed as the unhappy infants whose early and long-continued labour occasions the fabulous cheapness of our hardware and lace, and whose wages feed the intemperance of their parents."

Mr. Senior is a very sensible man and one of experience, but he is one of the last men who could ever be supposed to entertain any romantic feeling in this matter, and I think I shall not be charged with exaggeration if, following up what he says, I express my hope that your Lordships will see the necessity of an inquiry with a view of applying a remedy to a state of things so utterly disgraceful, and which, if allowed to proceed, must result in being so utterly destructive. I feel satisfied that the measures which have been already passed with a view of ameliorating the condition of the operative classes in this country have been attended with very beneficial results ; that they have tended to reconcile the working classes to their position in life. They are no longer disaffected towards the other orders of society ; they are no longer disaffected to property. Finding that persons of station and wealth in both Houses of Parliament are ready to look to their grievances and apply the necessary remedies, they are content to leave the application of those remedies in the hands of the Legislature. I, therefore, think that your Lordships and the other House of Parliament have now in your hands, by God's blessing, all the elements for making the working classes contented, thriving, and happy ; and with the view of enabling your Lordships to avail yourselves of the occasion I beg to move an Address for an inquiry into the employment of Children and Young Persons in trades and manufactures not already regulated by law.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that there could be no objection on the part of the Government to such an inquiry as that which the noble Earl had indicated. In saying that, he might observe that he himself had been as much opposed to the noble Earl's measures when they were first commenced as, perhaps, any Member of the House of Commons ; but he was bound to admit that his apprehensions as to evil consequences arising from those measures had not been fulfilled. On the contrary, they had given general satisfaction. They had benefited the manufacturers as well as the working classes ; and he concurred with the noble Earl in thinking that they had engendered in the minds of the latter a good feeling towards the other classes of society. As regarded young people, there must always be a distinction drawn between those who were employed in large mills and other manufactories and those who were employed merely in a domestic way in the houses of their parents. With the latter it was almost impossible to interfere. There was no doubt that the good work which the noble Earl had commenced might be extended to other trades than those which it at present reached, though it would be difficult to say, without further inquiry, what those trades were. On the part of Her Majesty's Government he could promise that inquiry would be made with the object of ascertaining whether any improvements could be effected of the character which the noble Earl desired to see accomplished.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that while he recognized the kindness of heart which induced the noble Earl to call the attention of the House to this subject, and while he bore testimony to the good results which had followed from the course legislation had hitherto adopted, he must still take the liberty of warning their Lordships against the error of supposing that legislation must be beneficial to whatever extent it was pushed. It was, on the contrary, one of the subjects to which the doctrine of limit peculiarly applied ; and much of the success which had hitherto attended the interference of Parliament was owing to the wisdom which had been shown in the measures that were passed. He feared that these restrictions could not be safely applied to many of those trades which the noble Earl had named, but he must, nevertheless, congratulate the noble Earl on having at this extreme period of the Session obtained a result in such perfect harmony with the cause to which he devoted so great a portion of his energies.

Motion agreed to.

PETITION FOR DISCHARGE.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had a petition of a rather singular nature to present to their Lordships. The petition was from a person named Joseph Jowett, the Appellant in two appeal cases to their Lordships' House. The appeals were both dismissed, and he was ordered to pay costs ; but having disobeyed that order, he was committed to the custody of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. The petitioner declared his willingness to pay, but being utterly unable to do so he prayed that he might be released from custody. The noble Lord concluded by moving that the petition be referred to the Appeal Committee.

Petition read, and referred to Appeal Committee.

QUESTION.

MR. COBBETT said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is intended to appoint an Inspector of Factories in place of Mr. Horner; and whether it is intended to appoint any additional Sub-Inspectors of Factories?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that his right hon. Predecessor had not deemed it necessary to appoint an Inspector in place of Mr. Horner; but four additional Sub-Inspectors had been appointed.

PARISH CHILDREN AS APPRENTICES.
QUESTION.

MR. COBBETT said, he would now beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether he is aware of any applications having been made by Master Manufacturers of the Northern and Midland districts to Board of Guardians of London to send parish poor children as apprentices into such districts?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied that the President of the Poor-law Board, who was not now in his place, would answer this question to-morrow.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ALDERMAN COPELAND called the attention of the House to a return made to the House (No. 317, of this Session) by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, of the very large sums paid by them to solicitors, surveyors, and other officers, and to the manner in which the affairs of the Ecclesiastical Commission were carried on. It appeared from the general Reports that the receipts of the Commissioners for the four years ending October 31, 1858, amounted to within a fraction of £800,000; the sum charged for the augmentation of deaneries and livings amounted to £340,000; and there was an expenditure in round numbers of £132,000, being £31,000 for office expenses and £101,000 paid to solicitors, surveyors and architects. He referred to the purchase and sale of Stapleton House, as a residence for the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, which was an instance of the way in which the affairs of the Commission were conducted. It appeared that £12,000 had been laid out on this property for repairs, making the whole cost of the estate £24,000. The Commissioners reported that they "were satisfied that the estate was worth the money that was paid for it." But in 1859 when the Commissioners were authorized to sell this palace it realized only £12,000, and the Commissioners then said, "that it appeared to them that the said sum of £12,000 was a fair and reasonable price for the said house with the lands and premises attached." For the year ending October 31, 1860, the collection and distribution of £96,500, the amount expended on the augmentation of poor livings, had cost the Commissioners £47,000. They had charged 5 per cent commission on most of their rental receipts, but in some cases only 2½ per cent, and 5s. per acre was charged for draining land. He (Alderman Copeland) was connected with a charity where thousands of pounds were collected at a very trifling expense. Why could not the Commissioners send circulars, and collect their revenues? It also appeared that after expending £14,000 on the official establishment for able accountants they had gone to additional expense for an actuary. And yet, after all, it appeared from Mr. Arbuthnot's letter that a complete check did not yet exist for verifying the accounts. There was in the returns various sums amounting to £5,280 allowed by the Commissioners for interest. What did that mean? The accounts showed a balance of £260,000 in their hands. Did they trade with this money? He hoped the Government would sanction an inquiry into the subject, and he moved the appointment of a Select Committee for that purpose.

SIR GEORGE GREY understood the hon. Gentleman rather to give notice of a Motion to that effect for next Session than to make such a Motion now. The question, he thought, could hardly be satisfactorily discussed in the present state of the House. If it was to be investigated at all, it would be best inquired into by a Committee. Without pledging himself to agree to the hon. Gentleman's Motion, if made next Session, he thought there were grounds which made an inquiry desirable. He was only sorry the subject had been gone into in the absence of the hon. Member for Kent (Mr. Deedes) and the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), who, expecting it would be brought on sooner, had several times attended to make observations in regard to it; but they had now both left town. Considering the hon. Gentleman's Motion to be merely formal, he should postpone any remarks he had to make on it until it was brought forward next Session.

MR. ALDERMAN COPELAND said he would do so.

THE GALWAY PACKET SERVICE.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE wished to put a Question to the noble Lord at the head of the Postal Department, of which he had already given notice, and he hoped some positive answer would be given with regard to the intentions of the Government respecting the postal communication from the port of Galway to the North American colonies. They had been told in that House that they must wait for the answer of the Government until the Committee to which the matter had been referred had made their Report. The Committee had made its Report, the time for which the Prime Minister asked to consider their recommendations had been granted, and it would now be rather strange if Parliament were allowed to separate without any statement of the intentions of Government. If the Government could be supposed to be animated by the most deadly spirit of enmity towards the Galway Packet Company, they could adopt no measure more directly calculated to injure and crush it than by leaving in uncertainty the course which they would ultimately pursue. The Company were not only restrained from pushing their operations with vigour, and from adding to their fleet, but if ultimately no contract were to be granted or revived for establishing a direct postal service between Galway and America, it would be better that the affairs of the Company should at once be wound up. It was notorious that ever since the suspension of the contract the Company had been put to great expense—he would not say in consequence of any promise or engagement, but by the hopes which had been held out that a valuable contract would once more be given to them. In consequence of those inducements a sum of from £50,000 to £60,000 had been expended in the preparation of vessels. Of the whole of this money the shareholders will have been unfairly deprived through the delay of the Government in pronouncing its decision, if eventually that decision should prove unfavourable to their interests. In justice, not only to the shareholders but to the people of Ireland, who felt deeply interested in this question, he hoped their Lordships would receive from the Treasury bench a distinct statement of what the intentions of the Government were, and what the Company had to expect.

Sir George Grey

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that before his noble Friend the Postmaster General gave any reply to the Question which had been put to him, he wished to call their Lordships' attention to one point which the noble Marquess had overlooked. This subject had been discussed in the other

House of Parliament, where naturally a money question should first be agitated; and the answer then given by a Member of Her Majesty's Government in effect was that the Government were not indisposed to take into their consideration, and, if they thought fit, to submit to the House of Commons, a proposal for establishing a communication between Ireland and America which should be founded upon open competition, and which upon consideration might appear well calculated to answer all the required purposes. He would remind their Lordships that in the report of a Commission on the Packet Service drawn up and presented to Parliament his noble Friend's eminent predecessor (Earl Canning) laid down a rule that, to prevent favouritism to any party, there should be established the principle of open competition for postal contracts. In the case of Galway that wise and just rule had been set aside. The Galway contract did not now exist. It had been put an end to by his noble Friend the Postmaster General, and that decision had been approved by the Ministry at large. Under those circumstances he trusted the Government would, in conformity with Lord Canning's Report, with Lord Palmerston's declaration, and with sound principle and usage, make the future contract a matter, not of favour, but of open competition.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that when the noble Marquess asked him a similar question on a former occasion, he was not prepared to express any decided opinion on the part of the Government in regard to the proceedings which were then taking place before the Select Committee. That Committee had since reported, and the result of the evidence taken before the Committee and their Report was that, under the circumstances of the case, the Government were justified in putting an end to the contract, as the Company were in a total state of inability to perform its conditions. At the same time the Committee stated that there were circumstances which undoubtedly entitled the Company to favourable consideration, and they expressed an opinion that it would be desirable, if the Company were in a competent condition to continue the contract, that the matter should be reconsidered on a future occasion. The Chairman of the Company, in his evidence before the Committee, distinctly stated that under no circumstances would the Company be prepared to resume the contract until February 1, 1862, and he also stated his opinion to be that the contract could not be conducted with advantage without a considerable departure from the terms originally granted by the Government and accepted by the Company. As he had already stated, the Committee were of opinion that, under the circumstances of the Company and the unfortunate accidents that had occurred, they were entitled to the favourable consideration of the Government. Her Majesty's Government were disposed to give every consideration in their power to the recommendations of the Committee, if at the end of the year, when the proposed time came for renewing the contract, the Company showed they were in a situation faithfully to continue it in conformity with all the conditions of the contract, particularly as to speed, and carrying the mails to St. Johns. As, however, it was impossible for the contract to be entered into until February, 1862, by which time Parliament would have met, it was out of the power of the Government to give any decided or positive opinion, although there was every disposition to deal with the Company as favourably as possible, and to receive any representations they might make as to their position and their ability to fulfil the contract.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT. SPEECH OF THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS.

THE PARLIAMENT was this day prorogued by Commission.

The LORDS COMMISSIONERS — namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Westbury); The LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Earl Granville); The LORD STEWARD (The Earl of St. Germans); The LORD CHAMBERLAIN (Viscount Sydney); and The LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON — being in their robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack; and the COMMONS being come with their Speaker, the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills.

Then THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered the Speech of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS as follows:—

“ My Lords, and Gentlemen,

“ WE are commanded by Her Majesty to release you from further Attendance in Parliament, and at the same Time to convey to you Her Ma-

Her Majesty's Acknowledgments for the Zeal and Assiduity with which you have applied yourselves to the Performance of your Duties during the Session of Parliament now brought to a Close.

"HER Majesty commands us to inform you, that Her Relations with Foreign Powers are friendly and satisfactory, and Her Majesty trusts that there is no Danger of any Disturbance of the Peace of Europe.

"THE Progress of Events in Italy has led to the Union of the greater Part of that Peninsula in One Monarchy under King Victor Emmanuel. Her Majesty has, throughout, abstained from any active Interference in the Transactions which have led to this Result, and Her earnest Wish as to these Affairs is, that they may be settled in the Manner best suited to the Welfare and Happiness of the Italian People.

"THE Dissensions which arose some Months ago in the United States of North America have, unfortunately, assumed the Character of open War. Her Majesty, deeply lamenting this calamitous Result, has determined, in common with the other Powers of Europe, to preserve a strict Neutrality between the contending Parties.

"HER Majesty commands us to inform you that the Measures adopted for the Restoration of Order and Tranquillity in Syria, in virtue of Conventions between Her Majesty, The Emperor of Austria, The Emperor of the French, The King of Prussia, The Emperor of Russia, and The Sultan, having accomplished their Purpose, the European Troops which, in pursuance of those Conventions, were for a Time stationed in Syria to co-operate with the Troops and Authorities of The Sultan, have been withdrawn; and Her Majesty trusts that the Arrangements which have been made for the Administration of the Districts which had been disturbed will henceforth secure their internal Tranquillity.

"HER Majesty has seen with Satisfaction the rapid Improvement in the internal Condition of Her East Indian Territories, and the Progress which has been made towards equalizing the Revenue and Expenditure of that part of Her Empire.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"HER Majesty commands us to convey to you Her warm Acknowledgments for the liberal Supplies which you have granted for the Service of the present Year; and Her Majesty has seen with Satisfaction that, after amply providing for the Wants of the Public Service, you have been able to make a sensible Diminution in the Taxes levied upon Her People.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"HER Majesty commands us to express to you the deep Gratification with which She has witnessed the Spirit of devoted Patriotism which continues to animate Her Volunteer Forces, and the Admiration with which She has observed their rapid Progress in Discipline and Military Efficiency.

"HER Majesty has given Her cordial Assent to the Act for completing the Number of the Members of the House of Commons by allotting the forfeited Seats of Sudbury and Saint Albans.

"HER Majesty trusts that the Act for improving the Laws relating to Bankruptcy and Insolvency will be productive of important Advantage to the Trade and Commerce of Her Subjects.

"HER Majesty has given Her ready Assent to Acts for consolidating and assimilating the Criminal Law of England and Ireland, and for promoting the Revision of the Statute Law.

"HER Majesty has given Her Assent to important Acts which She trusts will have the Effect of opening more largely Employment in the Public Service to the European and Native Inhabitants of India, of improving the Means of Legislation, of furthering the Ends of Justice, and of promoting the Contentment and Well-being of all Classes of Her Majesty's Indian Subjects.

"HER Majesty has assented with Pleasure to the Act for the Improvement of Harbours on the Coast of the United Kingdom, and for relieving Merchant Shipping from Passing Tolls, and also to the Act for improving the Administration of the Law relating to the Relief and the Removal of the Poor.

"HER Majesty trusts that the Act for rendering more easy Arrangements connected with the Drainage of Land will assist Agricultural Improvements in many Parts of the United Kingdom.

"Her Majesty has gladly given Her Assent to many other Measures of public Usefulness, the Results of your Labours during the Session now brought to its Close.

"HER Majesty has observed, with heartfelt Satisfaction, the Spirit of Loyalty, of Order, and of Obedience to the Law, which prevails throughout all Her Dominions; and She trusts that by wise Legislation, and a just Administration of the Law, the Continuance of this happy State of Things will be secured.

"ON returning to your respective Counties you will still have important public Duties to perform; and Her Majesty fervently prays that the Blessing of Almighty God may attend your Exertions, and may guide them to the Attainment of the Objects of Her Majesty's constant Solicitude—the Welfare and Happiness of Her People."

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said ;

My Lords and Gentlemen,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Tuesday, the Twenty-second Day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday, the Twenty-second Day of October next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THE GALWAY CONTRACT.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BRADY called attention to the Report of the Select Committee on the Galway Contract, and asked the First Lord of the Treasury what were the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to renewing postal communication between Galway and America? He was desirous of knowing whether Her Majesty's Government would agree to restore the contract, provided the Company proved that they had steamers of sufficient power, and that they were in possession of the requisite amount of capital to fulfil it?

LORD FERMOY wished to ask whether, in considering the question of postal communication between Ireland and the United States, the claims of the harbour of Cork will be regarded? That port was one of the most commodious in the world, and was also advantageous for its security and certainty, and he hoped it would be fairly considered by the Government before they decided upon any particular port.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: On a former occasion I stated to the House the general view of Her Majesty's Government upon the question of postal communication between the United Kingdom and North America. I then said that I thought it was very clear that a rapid communication between the United Kingdom and North America, and, more especially, a communication with St. Johns, which would give facilities for telegraphic notices, would be of great advantage to the commerce of the United Kingdom. My opinion remains unchanged. I do not conceive that the advantage would be less to the United Kingdom because that communication, supposing it goes through Ireland, would be attended with benefit to that country; because I think that we ought to look at Ireland in the same manner as a large landed proprietor would look at a portion of his property, the natural resources of which were not fully developed, and with respect to which any moderate and judicious outlay of capital would amply be repaid by the increased value it would give to his estate in general. Considering, then, that Ireland has hitherto been less rich than Great Britain, and has contributed in proportion less to the revenue of the empire, I think that if it could be shown that any arrangement of this sort, while it tended to give advantage to the commerce of the United Kingdom, was also likely to develop the industry and resources of Ireland, then a double advantage would thereby be effected. That seems to be the ground on which the late Government sanctioned the contract with the Atlantic Steam Company; on which that contract was ratified by Parliament, and afterwards adopted by the present Government. The Company, however, appear unfortunately not to have possessed means adequate to carry on the service which they engaged to perform. The project, indeed, had been taken up by a very large number of people in Ireland, and that, not simply as an advantageous speculation, but as a matter of national importance, inasmuch as it was believed it would tend to develop the industry and commerce of the country. It was, therefore, with great regret that the Government felt compelled to put an end to the contract. But they deemed it to be their duty to do so because—owing, I admit, to an unfortunate concurrence of circumstances wholly beyond their own control, to disasters at sea and other accidents—the Company were unable at the time to fulfil the engagements into which they had entered. A Committee of the House has since been employed in investigating the subject, and they have reported that the Postmaster General was justified in putting an end to the contract under the circumstances which I have mentioned. They, however, concluded their Report by strongly recommending that the claims of the Company to re-employment should receive at the hands of the Government favourable consideration. Well, that being so, and being of opinion that the establishment of postal communication between Ireland and America would be of advantage to the empire at large, I should be very much disposed to adopt the recommendation of the Committee, and to give a favourable consideration to the claims of the Company whenever they may be in a position to show that the capital and shipping at their command afford a reasonable prospect of their being able to fulfil the engagements into which they may enter with the Government. Now, I am asked whether we are prepared at this moment to enter into a fresh contract with the Atlantic Company; and my answer to the question must, I am afraid, be in the negative. This is the last day of the Session, and taking into account all that has passed relative to this contract, its origin, and the course subsequently pursued with respect to it, it is, I think, quite clear that we cannot enter into a similar arrangement with the Atlantic, or any other Company, except subject to the subsequent sanction of Parliament. Well, Parliament is about to separate, and will not, I hope, meet again until the beginning of next year, and it would, therefore, it appears to me, be somewhat unseemly now to enter into an engagement which, while it would be necessary that it should be submitted to the consideration of Parliament, could not be so submitted until after the lapse of several months. All I can say is that, if when the proper time comes, the Company should be in a condition to show us that they have the requisite amount of capital and machinery for performing the service across the Atlantic, and should apply for the renewal of the contract, we should look favourably on the application, and should be prepared to take it into our serious consideration with the view of submitting to Parliament any proposition founded upon it which we might deem it expedient to make. I on a former occasion stated that, while I was of opinion the establishment of such a communication as that of which I am speaking was desirable, I thought any future arrangements to effect that object should be the subject of open competition. That opinion has, however, I am bound to say, been a good deal modified by the Report of the Committee, and by what has taken place generally in reference to this matter; because, although unquestionably to resort to open competition in the case of an entirely new contract with this or any other Company would, it seems to me, be the proper mode of proceeding, yet there is much to be said in favour of the adoption of a different course in a case bearing on the interests of a vast number of persons of various classes who have invested their small savings in an enterprise which has been sanctioned by two Governments and by a Resolution of the House of Commons. Strong reasons, at all events, might be advanced for giving a Company so situated the first offer on such terms as might be deemed sufficiently advantageous. Now, assuming that when the proper time arrives arrangements should be made between the Government and this Company, then comes the question raised by my noble Friend the Member for Marylebone (Lord Cairns) as to the port of departure on which it would be desirable to fix. That, no doubt, is a point which is deserving of consideration; but whether Galway, which in a geographical point of view appears to be the most central and proper port for the purpose, or Cork, or Foyens, which possess advantages of their own, ought to be selected, is, after all, simply a question of practical detail, on which when the time to come to a decision on the matter arrives due weight will, I can assure my noble Friend, be given by the Government to the various circumstances which may recommend the selection of one port rather than another.

COLONEL FRENCH, not deeming the answer of the noble Lord quite satisfactory, said, he should next Session take an opportunity of asking the opinion of the House as to whether the conduct of the Postmaster General in putting an end to the contract was justifiable or not.

AMERICAN DUES.—QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government have received any communication from the President of the United States, or from the British Ambassador at Washington, that it is the intention of the Government of the United States to station vessels off the Ports of the Southern States of America, to collect and levy Duties upon Foreign Merchandise?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—Sir, the Federal Congress have passed a Bill into a law empowering the President, if he should think fit, to do what my hon. Friend says; namely, to station vessels off certain ports in the Southern States for the purpose of their collecting Customs Duties upon goods coming in. My hon. Friend will be aware that this proceeding, if it should be adopted, would be practically a supercession of the blockade, because you cannot blockade a port to prevent ships from entering, and at the same time levy Customs Duties on the assumption that the port is open. We have not yet been informed what are the intentions of the President with regard to the matter, or which of the two modes he will pursue.

BREECH-LOADING RIFLES.

QUESTION.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether any and what steps have been taken as to a decision on the merits of new weapons of war; and whether any breech-loading rifle has been adopted for any branch of our service?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he could reply to the first question of the hon. and gallant Member in the affirmative; and, in answer to the second, that breech-loading carbines had been served out to a portion of the cavalry; but they had not been found to be very successful, and that the making of some improvements in them was a subject under consideration.

PAUPER CHILDREN.—QUESTION.

MR. COBBETT said, he rose to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether he is aware of any applications having been made by Master Manufacturers of the Northern and Midland Districts to Boards of Guardians of London to send parish poor children as apprentices into such districts?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had made inquiry at the Poor Law Board, and found that communications had been received on the subject. The correspondence relating to it was now in print, and would, in conjunction with some Returns with respect to it, which had been moved for in the other House of Parliament, be published in the course of a few days.

ARMING NEAPOLITAN BRIGANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government has received accounts that 30,000 muskets, which had been taken by the French authorities from Neapolitan troops escaping into the Roman territory from before Gaeta, during the siege of that place, have been allowed by the French to be made use of in arming the bands of Brigands and Bourbonists which have been organized within the Papal territory for invasion of the Southern Provinces of Italy?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON replied that when the Neapolitan troops retired from the siege at Gaeta into the Papal territory they were disarmed by the French, in accordance with the usual course taken when troops entered a neutral territory. The arms had been handed over to the Papal Government, as the Government of the country in which the disarmament took place. Any subsequent distribution of such arms, therefore, must have been by the Papal and not by the French Government. If the hon. Member asked his (Viscount Palmerston's) belief on the matter he had no objection to saying that it was his opinion that a large quantity of those arms had been given to persons sent into the Neapolitan territory for the purpose of creating a disturbance and committing atrocities, but that that had anything to do with the French authorities was entirely out of the question.

SPAIN AND BRITISH SUBJECTS.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to ask, Whether a remonstrance will be addressed to the Spanish Government respecting the treatment of a British subject (the owner of the cargo of the Roman ship Mio Zio) at Port Mahon, with the connivance of the Spanish authorities, as detailed in correspondence to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, remonstrances had been made on the subject, and the case was now under the consideration of the Spanish Courts of Law, and our Chargé d'Affaires had orders to watch the proceedings.

IRISH BUSINESS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY rose to call the attention of the House to the acts and omissions of Her Majesty's Government during the present Session, especially as regards Ireland, and to move for a Return specifying the names of all Chief Secretaries for Ireland from the year 1830 to the present time, and the dates of their acceptance of and retirement from office respectively. The hon. Gentleman was proceeding to address the House when—

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Message to attend the LORDS COMMISSIONERS.

The House went, and the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills: And afterwards a Speech of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS was delivered to both Houses by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

Then a Commission for Proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Tuesday the Twenty-second Day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday the Twenty-second Day of October next.

APPENDIX.

[A BETTER REPORT.]

MR. C. P. VILLIERS referring to some misapprehension that prevailed as to the object of this Bill, and to the opinion that it introduced some new principle into the system of settlement, stated that there was nothing new in it, but was simply to give greater effect to a very beneficial measure passed in the last year of Sir Robert Peel's Administration, which was recommended by Sir Robert Peel for the benefit of the poor, but was chiefly intended to compensate the agricultural interest for the loss they apprehended they were to endure from the withdrawal of protection. It was alleged in that day that the burden cast upon the land of maintaining the poor was greatly aggravated by the fact that after the poor had quitted their parishes and had got employment in the manufacturing districts, and sometimes had dwelt there for several years, they were removed back again upon their parishes when a reverse in trade occurred, and their labour was not immediately required, the manufacturers thereby escaping from the liability of their support in distress, though they had the benefit of their labour when prosperous. The Bill then introduced provided that if any poor person had resided in any parish for five years without seeking relief that he should become irremovable from that place, and be relieved there when chargeable; and it was shortly afterwards provided that all such poor persons should when destitute be charged upon what is known by the name of the common fund of the union, and not upon the parish in which they had resided, and which subsequently was extended by charging other classes of poor upon the same fund. It soon became evident, however, that the principle upon which this common fund was originally raised was not applicable to the new charges now cast upon it. The object of that fund, as it was constituted upon the enactment of the New Poor Law, was to defray the charges of the union establishment, including the building of the workhouse and the salaries of the union officers. It was, therefore, deemed equitable that each parish should contribute to that fund in proportion to the use they made of it, and it was determined that an average should be struck of the expenditure in each parish for the maintenance of its poor during the three preceding years, and according to that result would be the proportion which each parish would have to contribute to the common fund—it being supposed that the expenditure of each parish for the support of its own poor depended more or less upon its own management; but, as soon as charges were cast upon this fund for the support of a class of poor, and of objects over which they had no control, it was quite clear that there was no equity whatever in the principle on which that fund was constituted, and that some change in this respect was needed, it having shortly after become apparent (illustrating in a very marked manner the extraordinary injustice of the principle), that in proportion as any parish had more of its own poor to support, so had it a greater contribution to make for the new class of poor (then chargeable on the common fund), who might not even have resided in their parish, and over whom they could exercise no control—and thus, the more poor of its own it had, the more on that account had it to pay for the support of others poor; and that while, if any parish could exempt itself from having poor of its own, it contributed nothing at all to the common fund of its union. This measure, therefore, which in its purpose was both just and wise, became the subject of very general complaint, in consequence of this injustice which was incidental to it, which originally had not been foreseen, and for which no provision had been made subsequently, and had continued to be felt for a period of ten years, and until the year 1858, when a Committee was granted by the Government to inquire into the operation of the Act generally, and into the grounds on which it was especially complained of. This inquiry extended over three Sessions, and after a searching investigation during the last Session came to certain definite resolutions on the subject on which substantially the present Bill is founded. The first of these, after asserting that the law had operated beneficially, and might be extended further with advantage to the poor, recommended that the period of residence for acquiring a status of irremovability should be reduced from five years to three. 2ndly, that the residence should be in the union instead of the parish only, and the 3rd that there should be a different way of computing the contributions of parishes to the common fund. With respect to the two first, the evidence admitted of little difference of opinion, and they were agreed to unanimously by the Committee. They will enable the parish authorities, in the first place, to ascertain with far greater ease whether the period of residence has been completed, according to the requirement of the law, and will, by extending the residence from the parish to the union fulfil with much more fairness the original intention of the act. The most important change, however, in the present law is in the 9th Clause, which provides for the maintenance of the common fund by assessment on the rateable value of all the parishes in the union. There was some difference of opinion on this point, and a plan devised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire was proposed, combining the population with the property of a parish, in order to determine its liability to the support of this fund, but without any reference to the sources of the peculiar charges cast upon it. This scheme, under the influence of that right hon. Gentleman in the Committee, was carried by a majority of one, and it so appears to have been adopted by the Committee; but as it had not been supported by any other witness than the right hon. Gentleman, who gave evidence himself in its favour, and that as he had no reason to suppose, from ample and impartial inquiry that he had instituted since the Report had been published, that it was approved of in any part of the country, he had not adopted it in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had, however, given notice of proposing it again in the House as an Amendment to that part of the Bill, and he would then be able to explain on what grounds it was to be recommended. He believed that he would find that more than one Member who had voted in its favour upon a misapprehension of its effect had since changed his opinion, and would support the Bill as it had been drawn; and he (Mr. Villiers) trusted, therefore, the House would not adopt the Amendment. The Bill would adequately meet the great injustice which occurred in consequence of the very different circumstances of the different parishes, and correct the anomaly of wealthy proprietors who might own, or with two or three others possess, a whole parish, and by getting their labourers from other parishes where no limit could be placed on the habitations of the poor, could not only escape all charge for any poor of their own, but, also, any liability at all for the poor charged upon the common fund. And though certain parishes by having no dwellings for the poor to occupy and get settlements, might still have no poor of their own, yet the property of those parishes will be made liable in future to the common burdens of the union. He begged the House not to imagine that it was merely an evil that applied to towns, and that the agriculturist was now benefited at the expense of the town. The evil in question is, on the contrary, of frequent occurrence between two parishes of an exclusively agricultural union, or between two parishes in the heart of a great city or manufacturing town, and springs out of the peculiar manner in which property is held or occupied in those places. For instance, in the City of London Union there are upwards of ninety parishes, with every variety of difference among them, and the different liabilities for the support of the poor in those parishes are rendered almost capricious in consequence. The Bank of England, for instance, stands in a parish in which there are no poor, and, therefore, that vast establishment contributes nothing to the common fund. Again, the parish in which St. Katherine Docks are situate, there are hardly any poor, the space being nearly all occupied by the docks, but the neighbouring parishes where the the labourers swarm, and most of whom work in the docks, have not only their own poor to support, but on account of their own being numerous have a much larger contribution to make to the common fund, in support of the poor of other parishes. By reference to the evidence it will be seen that many similar cases are to be found among the agricultural parishes. This Bill, therefore, has not in view the favour of any particular interest. The agriculturists, however, have little to fear now from any increase in the burden of the poor. The last census, if referred to, will clearly show that during the last decennial period there has been a constant tendency to migrate from the country to the town; and that, while in a great number of agricultural counties the population has greatly diminished, the increase in the towns has been greatly in the increase, and has much exceeded that of the whole country which was about 12 per cent. The Bill now before the House is proposed at a time when the benefit by it will be conferred on the poor and the injustice to a vast body of ratepayers will be corrected without any of the risk or injury arising from sudden or violent change. He had taken great pains to ascertain the feeling of the Boards of Guardians and other persons competent to form a correct judgment on the subject, and he could safely say, upon the assurance of the inspectors of the Poor Laws, who had better means throughout the whole country than any other people of judging of such matters, that the great majority of the guardians were in favour of the change proposed, and that, where an opposite opinion exists, it is found to be chiefly among those who have individual and special interests themselves against it. The subject had been, as he had said before, most fully investigated; and the measure then before the House was strictly in conformity with the evidence which was most impartially and fairly taken before a Committee nominated by the last Government, and composed of persons holding very different political opinions. It was not a proposition for a wholesale change in the law of settlement, it was, on the contrary, only a moderate measure in a direction in which the public feeling had long been pointed, and which, if it was now rejected, it could not fail to give a great impetus to the movement in favour of a general and immediate equalization of rates throughout the whole country. He believed, therefore, that the House would act wisely in carrying the measure in the state it was now proposed to them.
